PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, February 23, 1922.)

The Senate met in legislative session at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

EMPLOYMENT IN THE NAVY YARDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a memorandum submitted by Mr. Samuel Gompers, relative to employment in the navy yards, together with the reply of the Secretary of Navy thereto, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PACKERS IN UNRELATED LINES OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney General, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution 211, a report of the steps taken to enforce and carry out the consent decree entered by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia on February 27, 1920, in the suit of the United States of America against Swift & Co. and others, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES, POSTAL SERVICE, 1923 (S. DOC. NO. 141).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for the Joint Postal Commission, $125,000; for rewards to postal employees for inventions, $5,000; for salaries, Railway Mail Service, $980,000; for purchase of canvas for mail sacks, $1,000,000; in total amount, $2,110,000, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) to continue the military status of persons deserting the military or naval service during the World War, and the amenability to trial of those persons who failed to comply with the terms of section 5 of the selective service law.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2492) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1921, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 8475. An act to relieve enlisted men affected thereby from certain hardship incident to the operation of the proviso of section 4b of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, and to protect disbursing officers in connection therewith; and

H. J. Res. 263. Joint resolution authorizing the purchase of land for cemeteries for American military dead in Europe and the improvement thereof.

The message also announced that the House had adopted a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 49) authorizing correction in the enrollment of title in the bill (H. R. 5013) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the use of certain titles on tablets and other memorials, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the chamber of commerce of Neodesha, Kans., favoring the passage of the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the eleventh congressional district of Massachusetts, the American Association for the Recognition of the Irish Republic, composed of 24 councils, remonstrating against the ratification of the pending four-power treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented telegrams and a communication in the nature of petitions from Henry S. Hitchcock, secretary Connecticut Hardware Association, of Woodbury; the Gongbell Manufacturing Co., Bevin Bros.' Manufacturing Co., the East Hampton Bell Co., and Bevin & Wilcox Line Co., of East Hampton; and sundry employees of the Waterbury Trust Co., of Waterbury, all in the State of Connecticut, favoring inclusion in the pending tariff bill of the American valuation plan, so as to better meet foreign competition and maintain the American standard of living, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Mary Clap Wooster Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of New Haven, Conn., protesting against proposed commercial water-power development in the Roosevelt-Sequoia National Park, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

He also presented a memorial of sundry members of Wadsworth Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Middletown, Conn., remonstrating against proposed commercial water-power development in the Roosevelt-Sequoia National Park, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Steuben Society of America, of Hartford, Conn., protesting against American naval disarmament and the United States entering into any entangling alliances with foreign powers, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a mass meeting of sundry citizens of Lithuanian descent held at the Duggan School Gymnasium, Waterbury, Conn., on February 16, 1922, protesting against the occupation of Vilna, Lithuania, by the Polish Government and urging the recognition of the Republic of Lithuania by the United States Government, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Capt. G. A. Hadsell Camp, No. 21, Department of Connecticut, United Spanish War Veterans, of Plainville, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing pensions for widows of Spanish War Veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Mr. and Mrs. T. Edward Davis, of Canterbury, Conn., praying for relief to the suffering peoples of Austria by extending for 20 years payment of Austria's debt, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of the Central Labor Union and sundry members of the Up-Town Social Club, all of Meriden, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the manufacture and sale of light wines and beers, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAY OF THE ARMY AND KINDRED SERVICES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senate will recollect that under the act of Congress of May 18, 1920, a joint committee of Congress was provided for and charged with the duty of making recommendations concerning the revision of the pay and allowances of the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Coast Guard, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service, and were directed to report to their respective Houses.

The joint committee, Mr. President, has finished its work, has completed its report, and on its behalf I submit the report to the Senate, with the request that, in accordance with a resolution heretofore adopted, the report be referred to the special committee of five Senators to be appointed by the Presiding Officer. I also ask that the report may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report (No. 526) will be received and printed.

NAVAJO TIMBER CO.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1945) to reimburse the Navajo Timber Co., of Delaware, for a deposit made to cover the purchase of timber, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 525) thereon.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on February 28, 1922, they presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3223) for the relief of Oliver A. Campbell; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3224) to permit joining the United States of America as a party defendant in an action in Federal and State courts in certain actions affecting title to real property; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 3225) for the relief of Helen Pennoyer Young; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PAGE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 169) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. Willem van Doorn, a subject of the Netherlands; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DISTRICT STREET RAILWAYS.

Mr. BALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 985) to amend the provisions of an act relating to certain railway corporations owning or operating street railways in the District of Columbia approved June 5, 1900, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYMENT IN NAVY YARDS AND NAVAL FACTORIES.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 247), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Whereas the cessation of construction of certain battleships and battle cruisers, their armament, machinery, and equipment, has caused a large number of mechanics and skilled artisans heretofore employed in various navy yards and naval factories, to be discharged from their employment in many cases after years of faithful service to the Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs is directed to investigate the possibility of providing employment for mechanics and skilled artisans who have long been in the service of the Government, by allocating and distributing to navy yards and naval factories repairs and repair work not presently done in such yards, together with the construction of such naval craft, their machinery and equipment, as has been authorized by Congress, and the construction of which is not to be terminated by the treaties on the limitation of armament recently agreed to by the Government of the United States; and to report to the Senate its findings and recommendations in the premises.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on March 1, 1922, the President approved and signed bills of the following titles:

S. 982. An act for the relief of Louisa Frow; and

S. 1951. An act for the relief of John Hickson, jr.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	McKellar	Rawson
Ball	Gooding	McKinley	Robinson
Borah	Hale	McNary	Sheppard
Brandegee	Harreld	Moses	Smith
Broussard	Harris	Nelson	Spencer
Bursum	Harrison	New	Stanfield
Cameron	Heflin	Newberry	Sterling
Capper	Hitchcock	Nicholson	Sutherland
Caraway	Johnson	Norbeck	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Townsend
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Wadsworth
Dial	Kellogg	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Kendrick	Page	Warren
Ernst	King	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
Fernald	Ladd	Pittman	Watson, Ind.
Fletcher	Lenroot	Poindexter	Weller
France	Lodge	Pomerene	Willis
Gerry	McCormick	Ransdell

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of a death in his family.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent on account of serious illness in his family. It ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] are engaged at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, unless there is some Senator who desires to speak this morning upon the four-power treaty, which was taken up yesterday in open executive session, I shall not make a motion to go into open executive session, because I think it very important that we should dispose of the proposed rule which was the unfinished business in legislative session when we took a recess last evening.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator whether it is probable that it will be taken up at all to-day?

Mr. LODGE. No; I shall not call it up unless the Senator desires to speak.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to speak to-day.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; then I shall not call it up to-day.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the Senator from Massachusetts indicate whether he would open the discussion on the four-power treaty?

Mr. LODGE. I made no statement about what I am going to do, except that I would not call the treaty up to-day unless some Senator desires to speak upon it now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Another Senator requested me to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the treaty is likely to be called up before Monday.

Mr. LODGE. That I can not tell. I know there are several other matters pressing very much that are of importance, and I should be glad to give an opportunity to have those matters disposed of; but I think the treaties must take precedence, and if any Senator is ready to speak I shall move to go into open executive session for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like to hear the Senator's discussion of the matter. I am very much interested in hearing his views, and would like to know whether he expects to speak on it or not.

Mr. LODGE. I think I shall. If the Senator wishes to know what my personal plans are, I am disposed to wait until I can hear the objections to it. I expect to speak before the treaty is voted upon.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the Senator does not expect to open the discussion?

Mr. LODGE. I do not, at present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the matter as to when the treaties come up can not be determined in a little more exact way than he has indicated. As I understand the Senator from Massachusetts, he states that whenever any Senator advises him that he desires to make a speech on the treaty he will then ask the Senate to go into executive session. I should like to hear as many of the speeches which are made on the treaty as I can, and I can not tell when it may enter into the head of a Senator to go to the Senator from Massachusetts and say, "I should like now to speak on the treaty."

Mr. LODGE. I thought it was my duty to make the statement which I have made this morning, that I would not call up the treaty to-day unless some Senator desired to speak upon it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know the Senator from Idaho and one or two other Senators have said that they do not care to speak on the treaty to-day, but some other Senator may desire to do so. At 2 o'clock some Senator may come to the Senator from Massachusetts and say, "I wish to speak on the treaty," and we would not be notified.

Mr. LODGE. I have made the statement which I have to hold good for the day.

Mr. ROBINSON. That the treaty will not be called up to-day?

Mr. LODGE. That the treaty will not be called up to-day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to avail myself of the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and, if he will consent that a short executive session may be held, I wish to make a brief statement on the treaty, for the reason that I may not be here at the time he calls it up.

Mr. LODGE. It is my intention to call the treaty up tomorrow and then to make the same statement which I have just made; but if the Senator from Nebraska wishes to speak now, of course I shall comply with his request.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very briefly, then, I should like an opportunity to proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the four-power treaty in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, proceeded to consider the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, on yesterday I voted to ratify the treaty between Japan and the United States defining our rights in the island of Yap. At a future day I expect to vote to ratify the treaty providing for the limitation of naval armament and also for the treaties relating to China. On the pending four-power treaty, however, I have reluctantly reached the conclusion that I can not vote for its ratification unless some changes are made by amendment or reservation and certain objections which I now see to it are removed.

Mr. President, the treaty now before the Senate was conceived in secrecy. In that respect its genesis suggests an old-fashioned and highly objectionable alliance. That is exactly the way alliances have always come into being. In this case every precaution of secrecy was taken in advance and every device of secrecy was employed in execution. When the call for the conference was issued the four-power treaty was not mentioned.

Mr. FRANCE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to proceed. I shall be very brief, I will say to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. I wish to suggest to the Senate, if the Senator will permit, that the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska are very important, and while I know that many of the Senators have made up their minds as to how they shall vote upon the treaty, regardless of the statements which may be made upon it, I do feel that, out of a sense of common, ordinary decency, Senators, even though they may have already decided, regardless of arguments, how they shall vote, should pay attention to the remarks of the distinguished ex-chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate upon this subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am not disturbed by a little conversation; I am used to the Senate.

Mr. FRANCE. I am disturbed, and I believe that Senators have a right to ask for order, and I ask that there may be order in the Chamber.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, when the call for the Limitation of Armament Conference was issued the four-power treaty was not mentioned, and when the agenda or program for the conference was made up the treaty was not upon it. The President himself has admitted to us that this treaty, strictly speaking, was not upon the agenda, or not included in it. Thus the public neither looked for nor anticipated the appearance of this treaty. So much for the advance precautions of secrecy which seem to me rather significant.

How, then, was it negotiated? Was it discussed at meetings of our delegates with the delegates of the other three countries interested? Apparently not. So far as we know, and, in fact as a result of affirmative statements, I feel justified in saying that it was not discussed at a meeting in which our delegates participated with the delegates of the other countries. On the contrary, each delegation, after secretly considering the subject among its own members, appears to have secretly selected one of their number to act, and to act secretly, without keeping records, notes, minutes, or memoranda. Not only were memoranda not kept for the public but apparently they were not kept for other members of the delegation. So the two Senators upon the delegation of the United States have not been in a position to advise their colleagues in the Senate as to the meaning of expressions in the treaty or upon the course of the negotiations. Not only were the proceedings held behind closed doors, without records, but even the fact that meetings were being held was kept from the public, and no communiques were given to the press of these meetings. Meanwhile the public was liberally supplied with an endless amount of information as to the details of the naval reduction proposed and of the discussion and the long speeches thereon.

The public was also given a liberal education in Chinese affairs, and most elaborate details were furnished of the negotiations concerning Chinese matters. All of the meetings concerning the treaties relating to China and disarmament and such matters were elaborately reported. Even the private negotiations between Japan and China over Shantung were played up for public attention, and 36 such meetings were each followed by an official communique. Everything was done to keep the public's attention during that period fixed on Shantung, poison gases, submarines, Chinese tariffs, and such matters, while a month of negotiations were secretly and clandestinely conducted on the four-power treaty that was designed to take the place of the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, my impulse on reading this treaty and knowing the purpose which I thought was behind it was to accept it in good faith and in the hope that it would promote peace and the settlement of questions in the Pacific Ocean. I arrived at that conclusion in the full confidence that when this treaty reached the Senate of the United States the Senate, which is charged with the duty of passing upon it, would be placed in possession of full information and accorded access to all the records and details of the negotiations which had led up to the consummation.

My first shock, Mr. President, was the discovery that even the President of the United States, who called this conference, did not understand the treaty and had not learned of the secret agreement between the negotiators concerning the meaning of certain language in the treaty. He did not know and had not been advised that the language "insular dominions"—I believe that was the term—which obviously refers to Australia and New Zealand, also included the mainland of Japan, as a result of a secret understanding reached by the negotiators themselves. That particular ambiguity has been cured by a subsequent understanding, and the views of the President in that understanding have been written into the treaty, and the secret agreement as to the inclusion of the Japanese dominions has been done away with. So, in common with other Senators, I found a growing desire on my part to know a little more about this short treaty which had been so carefully concealed from the public during all its negotiation, and I looked forward to the time when we would be advised as to the negotiations which had led up to it.

I was therefore greatly pleased when the President of the United States came before the Senate and announced his intention to take the Senate of the United States into his confidence and to take a new step in diplomacy and to place in our hands for our consideration the records and minutes of the negotiations between the four powers which had led up to these treaties. I did not believe for a moment, and I think no other Senator believed for a moment, that the announcement of the President of the United States did not apply to the treaty that we now have before us and which had been negotiated in such absolute secrecy. When, as he spoke, I saw that pile of manuscript upon the desk, tied up as it was in red tape, I assumed, as I think every Senator assumed, that in that pile of manuscript we would find the minutes of the negotiations between the representatives of the United States and the representatives of the three other powers which led up to the formation of this four-power treaty.

I had no special interest in the minutes and records that pertained to the other treaties. Practically speaking, they had all been published in the papers and we had read them day by day—not only the communiques, but in many cases the stenographic reports of the meetings of these committees. What I was interested in, and what every Senator was interested in, were the records of the negotiations that had not been published in the papers. But if you take up this book which I hold here, with its seven or eight hundred pages, and examine it you will find here almost exclusively a reproduction of the articles that had been printed in the papers of the United States before the President came to the Senate. It was a waste of money, as well as a joke on the Senate, to present that to the Senate as the record of the negotiation of the treaties that we were to pass upon.

Mr. President, failing to find in that record what I had been led to expect we would find there, the Senate of the United States on my motion adopted a resolution calling upon the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public interest, to present to the Senate such records as were in existence of the proceedings relating to the negotiation of this four-power treaty. We were unable to get the information from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who were delegates to the conference, because they frankly said that they had not been present at these negotiations. The negotiations had been carried on by a representative of the United States, of Japan, of France, and of Great Britain, and it happened that the representative of the United States was Secretary Hughes, and unfortunately Secretary Hughes had gone to Bermuda. So the Senate was left confessedly without any information concerning the negotiations leading up to this treaty in which language is used which may be of great significance in the future relations of the United States in the Pacific Ocean. So my motion was adopted, and the President of the United States was asked for such records as the State Department afforded of those negotiations.

Mr. President, I was innocent enough to believe that that would develop something. I knew that drafts were made of this treaty. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated that he had made a draft, but that his draft was not the one which we are now asked to act upon. He had indicated that there might have been a dozen different drafts. We know, from reading the newspapers over the course of the last six months, that unquestionably Mr. Balfour, when he came here, came with a draft of a treaty of this sort, because it was the desire of Great Britain to rid herself of the existing alliance with Japan, and the leaders of Great Britain had advocated the idea of getting rid of that alliance by bringing the United States into a larger alliance, or at least into another treaty; and so undoubtedly Mr. Balfour came to the United States with another draft. We do not know whether his draft was adopted or not; we do not know whether Japan presented a draft or not; but there are certain significant facts in this treaty which I think require the serious attention of Senators.

Mr. President, almost all treaties—yes; and alliances also, in many cases—which involve the cooperation of one nation to assist another in the face of aggressive action on the part of some other country, contain a provision that the aggressive action must be unprovoked. Who can explain the omission of the word "unprovoked" in that treaty? Was it in the draft which was presented by the Senator from Massachusetts? Was it rejected by Japan? Was it discussed at all? Why was it omitted? Are we to be called upon in the Pacific Ocean, whenever aggressive action is taken against Japan or aggressive action is taken against Australia or aggressive action is taken against New Zealand, to rush to the moral assistance of those nations and enter into a conference in order "to devise the best and most efficient means of meeting this aggression," without inserting the safeguard that the aggression must be "unprovoked"? Why was that significant word left out? We are entitled to know; and one of the words which must be inserted in this treaty, either by an amendment or by a reservation, in order that I can see my way clear to support it, is the word "unprovoked." I do not think the treaty-making body of the United States is justified in binding this country to come to the assistance of any other country in the event of an aggression unless the stipulation is put in the treaty that that aggression must be unprovoked.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator come to the conclusion that the effect of the treaty is to bind the country to come to the assistance of the other high contracting parties in the case of aggressive action by an outside power?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, article 2 certainly binds the United States in the event, for instance, that Russia takes aggressive action against the island of Sakhalin, or at least against the Japanese portion of Sakhalin, or against the island of Formosa, or any island along the coast of Asia to enter at once into a conference with Japan and France and Great Britain in order to devise the most efficient means of meeting such aggression. Unfortunately that is the situation we are in. There is just enough ambiguity about those words to leave many Senators in doubt as to their exact meaning. "The most efficient means" might mean one thing under one set of circumstances, and another under another set of circumstances; but when we agree to take such action for the purpose of restraining Russia or for the purpose of defeating Russia if she were the attacking party, I should say it is the part of wisdom for us to stipulate that Japan must not provoke such aggressive action on the part of the other country, and at the present time we know that Japan is taking such provocative action. We know—we have heard it from the lips of the Secretary of State himself—that the United States is in protest against the action of Japan. Japan has 60,000 men in Siberia, and is occupying the whole of the island of Sakhalin, half of which belongs to Russia; and it is a matter, I think, of considerable notoriety that one of the reasons why Great Britain desires to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance is because as long as that alliance exists there is constantly danger that Japan, by her provocative action, will drag Great Britain into trouble.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has failed to enlighten me, or I have failed to comprehend exactly what his position is. That is, I do not think the Senator has answered my question fully. I asked the Senator whether under article 2 of the treaty, the substantive portion of which he has quoted substantially, he thinks that the United States has bound itself in case of aggressive action by a fifth power against one of the insular rights of the high contracting parties, to come to the defense of the rights against which the aggressive action is taken. The Senator, as I understood him, states that he thinks the question is left in doubt as to the extent of our obligations; and yet he goes on and reaffirms that we are committed to come to their defense, and then proceeds to show what would happen in case Russia should attack the Japanese rights.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I perhaps have not answered the interrogatory sufficiently; and in fact, Mr. President, I do not feel fully qualified even to express my own conviction. I am speaking to-day because I have to leave the city, and I may not be here when the treaty discussion proceeds, and I thought I ought to express as far as I have formed them my views that certain amendments ought to be made before we vote to ratify this treaty; and I will say frankly that I am desirous of ratifying these treaties. I think the presumption ought to be in favor of any treaty of this sort, negotiated apparently for a worthy purpose.

Taking up the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, I think we run into a very awkward situation at once; and it was involved to some extent, I think, in a reservation which the Senator from Connecticut prepared. Suppose the emergency arises. Suppose Russia, in restoration of her power, should move across to the island of Sakhalin, and Japan should call upon us under the terms of article 2 of this treaty to enter into a conference and to agree with France, Great Britain, and Japan upon the most efficient means to meet this aggression.

Suppose we should have a President of the United States who concurred with Japan and France and Great Britain that armed force was the proper thing to interpose as the most efficient means. Are we willing to intrust to the President of the United States the making of an agreement, the coming to an understanding, which would put us in a position where Congress might be morally obligated, at least, to make war? I favor the insertion of some sort of a reservation at this point so that, if the President be authorized to negotiate with the three other parties to this treaty, at least he should make no obligation which would be binding upon the United States until the consent of Congress thereto has first been obtained.

This is not a new question in the Senate of the United States. Senators on the other side of the Chamber were very liberal in offering reservations of that sort when the Versailles treaty was before the Senate, or at least when the League of Nations covenant was before the Senate. They were very anxious then to make reservations against the power of the President to bind the United States without the consent of Congress, and yet under the terms of this treaty as it now reads, unless some reservation is adopted the President might, if he were so inclined, enter into an arrangement with the three other parties to this treaty which would put the United States in a very awkward position.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, the high contracting parties to this treaty are the four countries themselves. The Senator has suggested that the President—and I assume the Senator means either by himself or through a delegate he might send to a conference—might come to an understanding with the other contracting powers without the knowledge of Congress, and that then the United States might be in a very embarrassing position. Of course, when I speak of the President, I am talking about the presidential office, irrespective of who may occupy it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; I assure the Senator I have the same thing in mind. It may not happen during this administration; it may be at some time when there is a Democratic President; and I hope there will be one at an early date.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was not attempting to mention a subject about which we might disagree, Mr. President. I was trying to more accurately understand the statement of the Senator that if whoever might be President at the time when we were called upon to join the conference with the other high contracting powers should, so far as he was concerned, come to an understanding with the representatives of the other high contracting parties, and that should not meet the approval of the Congress or the country, it might put this contracting party, to wit, this country, in a very embarrassing position.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is my thought.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, the action of the President in coming to an understanding with the agencies of the other high contracting parties as to the most efficient measures to be taken to meet the exigency would in any way bind this country—this contracting party—without the consent of Congress or without the approval of Congress, I will put it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I expect that, technically speaking—legally speaking—it would not; but we listened to the President as he addressed the Senate the other day when he urged the Senate of the United States to ratify all of these treaties practically without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," and warned us that unless we did so the United States would be discredited, because his representatives had negotiated these treaties, and, of course, had done so within their constitutional powers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska has suggested that possibly this might be remedied by a reservation. I wish to suggest to the Senator that the objection which he makes to the treaty, and the objection which some of the rest of us entertain, can not be reached by a reservation. There is no possible way of relieving the treaty by a reservation of what I consider the defect of the treaty. There is political relationship here, there is political connection with these three governments. Article 2 is not to begin to operate, to have any vitality, no action is to be taken under it until war has begun, until an attack has been made, until an aggressive action has been taken, which is war. The formal declaration might not have been made, but when an attack is made, when an aggressive action has been taken toward a nation, there is a state of war.

There is no reservation which can reach a situation where the conferees are then called upon to provide the most efficient means by which to deal with the situation, because necessarily when the conferees meet to determine upon the most efficient means by which to meet the attack they must decide on something in the nature of a counter attack, and how can that be dealt with by a reservation? If the conferees agree that is the only way to meet it, of course we must necessarily back the conferees, or the treaty is absolutely worthless.

Mr. FRANCE. In other words, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interject, as a very noted publicist said of another treaty which came before this body, reservations would not cure its defects. He said, "I have always found it very difficult to edit a bad egg."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Maryland occupy a somewhat different position from mine. I would like to support this treaty. I think neither of them would care to have it put into a form in which they would support it.

Mr. FRANCE. I would say, Mr. President, in answer to that that I do not propose to support a treaty which is leading us directly toward a terrible war. What the Senator has already said about the island of Sakhalin is most true, and if the State Department had taken the trouble to inform itself as to conditions in Russia before entering upon these engagements it would never, in my judgment, have entered upon them, because there is not the slightest doubt in the mind of any man who is aware of the attitude of the Russian people toward the Japanese that they are moving on rapidly toward differences which will certainly ultimately lead to war, if they are not cured, and the island of Sakhalin is already in great contention, for the reason that there are valuable deposits there, particularly oil deposits, concerning which there are already controversies.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize that what the Senator says is to a considerable extent correct.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield; but I had intended to reply a little more fully to what the Senator said.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has substantially stated my position; but the great objection to the treaty is that it does not call for action until an aggression has taken place, and then conference, nine times out of ten, is simply as to the best method as to counter attack, and we are swept in regardless of the righteousness of the contest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think if the Senator reflects a little he will qualify that remark. I am afraid, and I have already stated, that this treaty is too much in the nature of an alliance to suit me; and if that be true, it is quite likely that these four powers, which undertake under this treaty to create a monopoly of interest in the Pacific Ocean, will be in such touch with each other that each of them will be well advised before the actual aggression occurs of what is going on; and I would suspect that the conference would be secret, and that it would be held before the world knew of any open performance. I can conceive of action being taken even before the matter has become notorious.

Mr. BORAH. Article 2 says specifically that until aggression shall have taken place there is no action for the conference to take.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize that that interpretation can be put upon it also.

Mr. President, there is an objection which occurs to any man against this treaty when he finds grounds for suspicion that it is an alliance. This objection the President of the United States can not brush aside by asserting that it is not an alliance. Another President of the United States may some day treat it as an alliance.

That is not all. What interpretation is put upon this treaty by the other parties to this treaty? We have already learned, through the medium of the Associated Press, that Baron Uchida, secretary for foreign affairs of Japan, has stated to the Japanese Parliament, in answer to questions, that while this treaty abrogated the Anglo-Japanese alliance, it in fact constituted a larger alliance; that it succeeded the Anglo-Japanese alliance by an alliance still larger and more effective. That was his explanation. He did not tell the Parliament of Japan that it was a treaty; he told them it was an alliance, and that it was an alliance at least resembling the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which had preceded it.

In my opinion, Mr. President, the ratification of this treaty as it exists now is going to put us in a position somewhat similar to that in which we found ourselves after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ratified. We found, and we have found repeatedly since that time, that there was a determined effort to interpret the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which it superseded.

So I think it reasonable to suppose that if this treaty is ratified as it reads now, with ambiguous language in it, Japan and other nations may insist, and Great Britain may insist, that this treaty shall be interpreted in the light of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which it supersedes. That is another danger which we encounter.

I had not intended to make a speech, but only to go very briefly into this matter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wanted to recur just for a moment to a thought suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. If I understood the Senator from Nebraska correctly, and I should like very much to know whether my understanding is correct or not—his position is about this: That under this treaty as it is now worded, in the event that one of these high contracting parties, other than the United States, should become embroiled in a difficulty with a fifth power, the United States would be under obligations to align itself with the other parties to this treaty, regardless of the merits of the controversy in which the party might be engaged. In other words, under the terms of this treaty the United States would be obligated to give its moral and sympathetic support, at least, to a settlement of any question of aggression which might arise under article 2, to give that support to the contracting party under this treaty; or, to state it differently, in advance we pledge our moral support, at least, to a settlement of any such difficulties in favor of the contracting parties to this treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Providing they relate to the islands of the Pacific Ocean, which are the subject of the treaty.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly, provided they relate to the islands involved in this treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. From the start I never saw the importance of this treaty to the United States. In fact, my first impression was that it was a large amount of fuss about a rather small matter, as far as we were concerned. What interest have we to be protected by this treaty? We have no possessions in the Pacific Ocean concerning which there is any doubt.

Japan and Great Britain have come into possession, as a result of the war, of certain islands which belonged to Germany. Under this four-power treaty we enter into a practical guaranty of the continued possession of those islands which those nations secured as a result of the war. We have not anything in that region except the Philippine Islands. Our title to them is absolutely good. There is no possibility that Spain will ever attempt to reclaim those islands. The general opinion of the United States, as I understand it, is that ultimately we shall get out of those islands when those people have reached a stage of development that they are able to take care of themselves. The islands are of no value to us. They are a difficulty to us, but there is no danger and there is no probability that we need the help of Japan, Great Britain, and France to hold them.

There is a material benefit which Japan and Great Britain receive under the terms of this treaty, for we practically give them a guaranty for Australia and New Zealand and all the islands which come to Japan and all the islands which come to Great Britain under the mandate of the League of Nations.

So it seems to me that we have very little to gain by entering into the treaty. It is not necessary to naval disarmament. It is not necessary to the protection of the affairs in China, in which we have manifested such great interest. Why, then, have we been dragged into this treaty at this time? Is it for the purpose of allowing Great Britain to relieve herself of an alliance which she must in any event get rid of in some way?

Mr. President, I have expressed in a somewhat rambling way my criticisms of the treaty. I would be glad to see such reservations and amendments as can, first, make it definite and certain that we are not bound to assist any of the other nations in any way against an aggression from any other country unless it is unprovoked; and, again, that if the President of the United States is to have the power to enter into an agreement with other nations at a conference as to taking efficient action for their protection, his agreement must be subject to the approval of the Congress of the United States, or, at least, of the Senate of the United States. I am not satisfied merely by the official statement that this is not an alliance when I know that Japan is declaring that it is an alliance. I am not satisfied with the statement of the President of the United States that he does not think it is an alliance when the next President of the United States may regard it as an alliance.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the Senator takes his seat I would like to ask him whether he does not think that one effect of the treaty would be to take care of our interests very largely in the Philippines, and if we get out of the Philippines as we hope to, would not this provision still protect the Philippines as against external aggression of any sort, as against Japan or any other country that might want to take the Philippines. Even after we retire from there we still would have to exercise certain power in the Philippines, and we are under obligation to see that they maintain their independence, and so forth. The question in my mind is whether this would not have the effect of protecting the Philippines in that contingency as well as in the present situation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My judgment is that when we get out of the Philippines we will get completely out. We may at that time enter into some sort of treaty with other countries to respect the independence of the Philippine Islands, but when we let go they will be independent. If it is desired, that sort of treaty might be made.

Mr. FLETCHER. I gather that the Senator's position is somewhat like the two gentlemen on a ship at sea. The story is of a father and son. A storm arose, and the son went to the father and said, "Fadder, vake up, vake up. The ship is sinking." The father said, "What do we care? We don't own it."

We may not own and may not be compelled to approve of any action as the result of the conference which may be held, but I take it at the same time the Senator is a little afraid of our position as one of the passengers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator a question or two for information. As I construe the treaty it does not have any relation to what might be denominated continental questions in Asia; for instance, the mainland of China or the mainland of some of the French possessions, and certainly not Siberia, Mongolia and Manchuria. It seems to be limited to insular possessions—island possessions.

The question I was about to ask was somewhat anticipated by my friend from Florida, but if we get out of the Philippine Islands, then our only insular possession in the Pacific, so far as I now recall, would be Hawaii. Does the Senator think that for the protection of Hawaii we are warranted in entering into a four-power treaty—and I may say in passing, too, that controversies are more apt to arise with respect to Pacific powers with respect to the mainland of China, the mainland of Siberia, than with respect to the islands of the Pacific.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly. I think there is no value at all so far as the Hawaiian Islands are concerned. We are still able to fortify those, and under the disarmament treaty that is proposed we can still continue to fortify those islands, and we are in a position to take care of them.

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that we have insisted, particularly since the days of Mr. McKinley and John Hay, upon the open-door policy in China and will insist upon a fair opportunity for legitimate and proper trade upon the Asiatic mainland, are we not more interested in the preservation of a fair status quo there or a fair opportunity for the development of people there and fair trading opportunities than we are in the island of Yap or those islands which are mandated in the Pacific Ocean, particularly in view of the fact that they are taken from us—at least we have no interest in them except such as might come through the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That question might be answered in several ways.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to inquire of the Senator, who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations and has given great study to this situation, if he is able to advise the Senate of the particular reason why such a treaty as this should have been negotiated at this time? Has he in mind any controversies which might arise and which would justify such a treaty as this? In other words, what are the troubles brewing or what was the mischief which we seek to have remedied by this treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suppose the United States has absolutely none. The United States' title to its Pacific islands is absolutely good. Great Britain and Japan have title to a number of German islands acquired by the war. There may be some question later about them. Germany might some day reassert her claim to those islands. We are not a party to the treaty of Versailles, and in my opinion we should not be a party in the remotest degree to guaranteeing possession of those islands to their present holders.

There has not been stated, so far as I know, in the committee or anywhere else, any reason why the United States should have entered into this treaty except to enable Great Britain to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. I think we are sacrificing rather too much, as the treaty now stands, to accomplish that purpose. I have never believed the Anglo-Japanese alliance was any great menace to us, never believed that the existence of the Anglo-Japanese alliance would cause us any great embarrassment. It is not up to us to provide the means by which Great Britain shall get rid of it. It is for Great Britain and her dominions themselves to relieve themselves of that alliance, and so far as I know that is the only reason why the four-power treaty was executed.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it not true that the treaty of Versailles did guarantee the title of the five principal allied and associated powers to all of these various islands in the Pacific?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The first thing the Senator from Wisconsin knows he will get me into a League of Nations discussion.

Mr. LENROOT. I think it is a fair question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is a vast difference between 50 nations of the world getting together in a league, expecting later to bring Germany into it, for the purpose of guaranteeing the peace of the world by justice and by peaceful settlement of dispute and, on the other hand, four nations getting together in the Pacific Ocean and notifying the world that they propose to hold its islands against all comers. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. The same parties in title are in this treaty, in so far as there is any recognition, as were in the treaty of Versailles, are they not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The whole world was in the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. LENROOT. No; as to the title to the islands covered by the treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is very true.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator was willing for the United States not only to respect that title but to guarantee it in the Versailles treaty, was he not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was ready as a supporter of the League of Nations—in which every nation of the world should be a member, including Germany—that the League of Nations should be bound together by the pledge of each member that it would respect and preserve the independence and territorial integrity of all others. But this is not that proposition at all. I am not going into an argument on the League of Nations.

Mr. LENROOT. I would not think the Senator would. Now let me ask the Senator another question. There was nothing in the Versailles treaty requiring the submission to Congress of any arrangement that was entered into by the League of Nations, was there not, so far as the United States was concerned?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There really was not anything of that sort until the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wisconsin and other congenial souls forced through the Senate a reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; and the Senator voted against it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And now I say what was wise then, if the Senator thinks it was, is wise now.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Senator thought then that it was not wise and voted to ratify without that reservation, and to-day the Senator thinks it is necessary. Is not that correct?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have said that in order to give this treaty my support I should like to see it done.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator has changed his mind.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I suggest that perhaps there has been a swapping of positions in this particular matter?

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement, and then to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. I desire to challenge the statement of the Senator that he and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and myself differ fundamentally upon this question. That is not a correct statement. The Senator from Nebraska has always, I believe, been opposed to alliances with foreign powers. He was favorable to the League of Nations, because he held, and there was some justification for so holding, that it was not an alliance, that it was an association of the great powers of the world which would ultimately include all of the powers. The Senator from Idaho and myself held another view. We felt that it did partake too much of the nature of an alliance, and therefore we opposed it. So that the Senator is quite consistent in opposing this as an alliance, for he would have opposed the League of Nations, I am sure, in spite of the fact that his party as a whole was for it, if he had believed it to be an alliance.

I will say with reference to the Senator from Wisconsin that of course he is in favor of this plan because it is an alliance and he was in favor of the League of Nations when he must also have believed that the League of Nations was an alliance.

But I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska this question: The Senator has suggested that the powers with whom we become associated under this compact may view it as an alliance. Is there not also the danger that the power with whom we are not associated may view this as an alliance and that, so viewing it, they may be tempted, if not indeed encouraged, to establish a counter alliance; and is there not danger of there really being created a new balance of power in the world?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator is eminently correct.

Mr. FRANCE. As a matter of fact, as I hope to show a little later, this is but a new balance of power which is being sought for very practical reasons by very practical men, and I think a little later I may be able to mention some of the companies which are financially interested in a new balance of power and perhaps some of the men who have been connected with those companies.

After all, Senators, idealism has not completely overtaken the world. It is always very wise, in studying a great international policy which is proposed, really to find out if there are any practical men back of the scenes, moving the scenery and pulling the wires. I think when such an examination is made in this instance it will be found that extremely practical men are working for extremely practical purposes.

There is a conflict of political and commercial interests; a conflict, on one hand, between Japan, France, and Great Britain, and, on the other, China, Russia, and Germany; and the thought suggested by the remarks of the eminent Senator in his very clear way, although he did not complete the statement, is that these great powers, China, Russia, and Germany—potentially the greatest powers in the world, if we consider their resources of man power and natural wealth—are naturally being thrown together into a counter alliance for the protection of their interests. I shall a little later call attention to the growing friction between Russia and Japan and between China and Japan, a friction which is not merely political, existing in the governmental departments, but a friction which has resulted in a common feeling on the part of the Russian people, even on the part of the peasants, with whom I have talked, out in the country districts, that it would be necessary for the Russians soon to deal with the Japanese question.

I merely wish to add at this point the fundamental reason for the soil of Russia being prepared for such seeds of conviction. The Russians feel, and the history of the world will prove that there is a sound basis for that feeling, that they have for many centuries been the great dam which has held back the tide of orientals which several times has threatened to overrun and to engulf Europe. Even to-day the Christian Russian peasants feel that they, with their brave hearts, are and must yet be the wall to hold back the great tide of yellow races so that Europe may not be inundated. They are asking why they have been deserted by the white men of the other nations and why it is that the other western powers do not sympathize with them when this invasion has again started, when there is a very evident movement on the part of the Japanese to eat their way into Europe through Siberia.

The suggestion of the Senator is one which I hope will be carefully considered. No; I do not "hope"; I am not given to indulging in futile and false hopes; so I do not hope, but I wish that this great question of the growing tension between Russia with her mighty armies—the mightiest armies in man power in Europe, I will say to the Senator—and the Japanese will engage the attention of those who are the defenders and proponents of the pending treaty. I feel much encouraged when the great Senator from Nebraska, who has rendered such distinguished services to his country, and who always stands by his convictions, rises to point out the danger of this treaty as forming an alliance, or at least an association, which may be considered by our associates under it as an alliance, and intimating, as he does, that there is also the danger that the other nations which are excluded may consider it to be an alliance, inviting the great danger of a counteralliance, and of a new balance of power, in which we shall be in the weaker position; in the weaker position because we shall be associated with the nations possessing less man power and less of natural resources; in a weaker position also because, it seems to me, that our position from the standpoint of international morality and justice is not one which can be defended.

All of this leads us back—and the Senator from Nebraska was not unmindful of the fact, as I have already intimated, when he said that he himself would be opposed to the United States being a party to it—to the great doctrine of Washington who was not only against alliances but who, for very practical reasons, warned us against showing favoritism to certain nations, against showing a partisan spirit toward certain nations, for, he said, that by so doing we should naturally invite the antipathy of those nations toward whom a less friendly and less partial spirit was shown. In other words, Washington, if he were viewing this particular problem, would say, "Of course, if you show special favors to Japan by giving to Japan certain privileges of conference with you, by giving to Japan certain territories; if you show certain unusual favorable attitudes and dispositions toward Japan, you naturally, of course, begin to invite the silent antagonism of Japan's real or potential enemies"; and she has two potential enemies, I can say to Senators to-day, who are mighty in their resources. When we show undue friendliness to Japan, and particularly when, at the same time, we show an antipathy to those two, potentially the greatest powers, perhaps, in all the world—Russia and China—we invite the antagonism of those powers; and, as the Senator has well said on this occasion and on the occasion when he was defending the League of Nations, it should be our disposition to cultivate friendship with all nations.

I am quite confident that the Senator from Nebraska would not have advocated our going into the League of Nations if he had not believed that that was a step in the direction of fulfilling the great injunctions of Washington to show friendship for all nations. He would not have considered that policy, I am quite sure, if he had felt that the League of Nations was a violation of the principles which were laid down in the words of Washington when he said:

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all.

And when he warned further that—

A passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the allusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists—

As the Senator has already so ably stated—and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld. * * *

Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts and influence of the other.

Oh, Senators, those words were not written by an ordinary man upon a conventional occasion; they were written by a man inspired at the most momentous time in all the history of the world, when, after having created this Republic, he was committing it to the great mission which he believed it was to perform in the world, and when he was giving a solemn warning against the many insidious dangers which might thwart its fulfillment of those purposes and lead to the destruction of the Republic.

Senators, I tell you that when we depart from the solemn injunctions of those inspired words we are running onto unknown and uncomputed perils, and I say that we are running counter to the great mandate given by the American people when they thought the League of Nations was an alliance.

Personally, I think that was a debatable question; personally, I think it was a debatable question whether the League of Nations was large enough so that it might be considered from its very nature an association, or at least the beginning of an association, of the powers of the world; and I hesitated for a long time as to what my position should be, for I have long advocated, together with the Senator from Nebraska, the proper kind of an association between the nations, each maintaining its own separate sovereign power, each acting, as an unbound nation, clothed with all of its unimpaired sovereignty, in cooperation with the other nations for the solving of the common problems of the world. There was a question whether the League of Nations was an alliance. The people of this country, I think, assumed that it was or that it might become one, and I think they disapproved of it; but certainly there is no question about this treaty. It is an alliance; it is an alliance partaking of all the dangers against which the Father of our Country warned us. It is an alliance which can not be entered into without a repudiation of all of those doctrines which the American people have held dear. I say—and I care not whether every Republican upon this floor denies me—that there is not a Senator here who can rise and show that this treaty is in harmony with the teachings of the Farewell Address of George Washington, and unless that can be done this treaty should be repudiated, I care not who is for it. But I propose to show, if I can, before this debate is over that very practical men are for this treaty for very practical reasons, and there will be some explaining to do by certain gentlemen if I decide to tell all that I have good grounds for suspecting. They may be able to remove my suspicions, but it will be encumbent upon them to do so.

The Senator from Massachusetts has said that he did not propose, in presenting this treaty, to say anything in explanation of it until he had heard the objections. I am surprised that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts should make such a statement.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not any objection to the Senator saying anything he wants to; but he must allow me the poor privilege of making a speech when I please, without advice from him.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I would not, of course, presume upon my friendship and my warm admiration for the Senator from Massachusetts to the extent of giving him advice; but I think it is proper for me to express regret that such a great treaty as this should be brought into the Senate and laid before us with the implication that the Senators must vote for it, with many of them having pledged themselves to vote for it, without a single argument being presented with the treaty why this Republic should suddenly reverse the policy of years—a policy clearly enunciated and enjoined upon us by the Father of his Country. I say it is most extraordinary.

I am very happy that many of the Senators on the other side, especially those from the Southern States, seem to be now disposed in the case of this treaty to reject it because it is an alliance. I say—I may not have made myself clear—I am very happy that they do realize that this treaty is an alliance. If they had realized or if they had believed that the League of Nations was an alliance, they would not have been for that.

I am very happy that so many of the Senators on the other side, many of whom come from the South, are thinking seriously upon the great words of the great southerner, George Washington, because he belonged to our South. I will say to the Senators on the other side, even though ours may be the most northern of the Southern States, that we as southern men are devoted to the doctrines of the great southerner, George Washington, and I know that the Senators on the other side are devoted to those doctrines; and I know this, and I will say it to my party: If you Democratic Senators stand steadfastly and determinedly for these principles which my party seems to be now repudiating you will meet with your reward at the hands of the American people, and I hope to God that you do, because a party which calls itself a Republican Party, when it repudiates the doctrines of George Washington has repudiated it all, and it has ceased to be in that instance the Republican Party.

I want to say that if I have to be elected to the Senate at the price of repudiating those principles, I can go back home and attend to other matters which I hope may be helpful to my State and to my country. I do not propose to buy my place in this body by a repudiation of the solemn injunctions laid upon us by the great inspired Father of his Country, even though some of these later men, so much wiser than he, who have not even taken the trouble to inform themselves on important problems in Europe or to send their emissaries to Europe to find out the real conditions there, are prepared now to repudiate him.

Mr. President, I must apologize for precipitating or prolonging this debate at this time, because I had intended to discuss the matter more fully at some other time.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have here a pamphlet of many pages, disclosing the cunning and crafty policy pursued by Japan in her aggression in the Russian Far East, and ask unanimous consent to include it in the RECORD. It is an elaborate article, and I do not desire to consume the time of the Senate in reading it, but will ask that it be included in the RECORD in regular 8-point type, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? If not, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

JAPANESE AGGRESSION IN THE RUSSIAN FAR EAST.

INTRODUCTION.

The conflict between Tsarist Russia and Japan, which culminated in actual warfare, was brought about by the identity of the policies of the two countries in Korea and Manchuria, and in part in Mongolia. Both sides, although they professed to the outer world the principles of independence, were actually aiming not only to gain a foothold in those regions, but to establish themselves there both economically and politically. When Japan, having acquired rights to Liao-tung as a result of the war with China in 1894, was obliged to return this district to China, after the protests of Russia, Germany, and France, this step, in which the chief part was played by Russia, could, of course, not gain the sympathies of the Japanese. All the more was this the case when Russia soon after (in 1896), obtained a valuable concession in Manchuria, namely, the zone for the construction of the Chinese Eastern Railway, two years later obtained the lease of the aforesaid Liao-tung (Port Arthur), and then, after a further two years, under cover of the Boxer uprising, occupied Manchuria. The effort of Russia in 1901 to legalize this seizure immediately encountered the opposition of Japan. The real threat involved of as successful an aggression on the part of Tsarist Russia in Korea, manifestly imposed upon Japan the ineluctable conflict with Russia unless Japan should be willing to reconcile herself to defeat.

But the events following upon the defeat of Tsarist Russia revealed the fact that Japan, emboldened by her victory, already harbored desires of another kind; she not only was not satisfied with the victory in Korea and southern Manchuria, not only had designs on northern Manchuria, but began to display open tendencies to fortify herself on the far eastern shores of Russia itself.

These tendencies at first manifested themselves in two directions: In the effort to obtain the dominating influence in the fisheries rights in the Far East and in the attempt to force a path; first, to the Chinese Sungari; then to the Amur, after having obtained navigation rights. In 1907 a fisheries convention was concluded, in accordance with the terms of the Portsmouth treaty, but the Japanese were not satisfied with the rights granted to them to undertake fishing on the Russian shores of the Okhotsk Sea, the Japan Sea, and the Behring Sea (excluding bights and rivers), on terms similar to those enjoyed by Russian citizens, but also desired to have fisheries rights in the Russian bights and rivers, where, in view of the weakness of Russian capital in the Far East, such rights would be equivalent to a complete predominance of the Japanese in Russian Far Eastern fisheries.

The Japanese did not succeed in 1907 in realizing this ambition, but the very attempt was significant and revealed the Japanese tendencies, which were soon to be heard from again, at the first favorable moment.

The attempts of the Japanese to obtain a legal right to navigate the Sungari (then navigated only by Chinese and Russians) and the Amur were made a number of times, and the Tsarist Government, after its defeat on the fields of Manchuria, was obliged to fight stubbornly against these efforts of the victorious Japanese. Although she was fighting obstinately with Russia in China, aiming to force her out of the country, as well as out of Korea and southern Manchuria, Japan nevertheless concluded a number of secret agreements with Russia, having as their general aim to combat the efforts of other powers to establish themselves in China. The publication of the secret treaties of 1907, 1910, 1912, and 1916 has been particularly interesting in this connection.

When Tsarist Russia was occupied on the German front and left the Far East exposed, the Japanese, under these conditions so difficult for Russia, attempted again to bring up these questions, and almost obtained a favorable solution of them, but special effort was put forth after the revolution, and particularly after the civil war.

There was then revealed a complete program "to conquer" the Russian Far East, not only economically but also politically, and the same methods that had been applied by Japan and Tsarist Russia with regard to China and Korea were also used by Japan with regard to Russian territories.

The characteristic feature of this policy in the Russian Far East has been the cautiousness with which Japan proceeded both at first and in the sequel. Although she intended to fall upon the Far East and exploit this serious situation of the Russian people she nevertheless did not decide to put through this program on her own initiative. First, from December, 1917, to August, 1918, playing upon the feelings produced in England and France by Russia's abandonment of the war, Japan aroused the Allies against the Russian Far East, and particularly against Vladivostok, by alleging that the region was one in which the lives and property of foreigners were in danger, and which would require a prolonged presence of warships and landing parties. Then when France and England had decided upon an active policy in Russia, hoping to overthrow the soviet government with the aid of all the antibolshevik elements and thus to force Russia back into the group of belligerent nations, the Japanese assumed a modest position of watchfulness until England and France should succeed in drawing America into the affair. And then after the question of sending troops into Russian territory had been decided upon Japan still waited for the "invitation" of her new Far Eastern competitor—America. As time went on the Japanese, having been given an opportunity to reveal themselves in the Russian Far East in "snow-white" garments, not only made use of all the circumstances favorable to them, but specifically and tirelessly manufactured such circumstances (which is the most characteristic feature of their conduct), in order to expand further and further the zone of their military influence, and under this pretext to establish themselves wherever their predatory program might lead them. But while they were grasping new lands the Japanese did not lose their watchfulness; they did not cease to be on their guard in international matters, and each time that it is required by circumstances they will restrict their appetites and change their tactics. Of the lands seized by them, in the most literal sense of the word, Transbaikalia, the Amur, the Maritime Province, Sakhalin, and portions of Kamchatka, the Japanese were obliged to give up first the Amur, where they began to find things a little hot for them; then Transbaikalia; then a part of the Maritime Province, and now they are established only in the southern part of the Maritime Province, on Sakhalin, and along the lower course of the Amur, but they have not lost their hopes to return. There is no doubt that the Japanese will be obliged to leave also the southern part of the maritime Province, but they have a strong hold on the Sakhalin region (Sakhalin and the lower Amur), where they have introduced their own administration, feel themselves at home, and may there constantly threaten the Far Eastern Republic. The artificially provoked incidents of Nikolayevsk have served as a suitable pretext to the Japanese to justify this seizure to the rest of the world, a seizure that was effected according to their "shortened" program of conquest.

The period of watchful activity in fulfillment of Japanese policy, and the possibility of a further "shortening," or, on the contrary, "widening," has not yet ended; the cause has been the unstable international situation and chiefly the position of the United States, with whom Japan does not desire to have a premature collision, particularly at a moment when the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese treaty seems in doubt.

A study of the Japanese policy throughout the Far East, particularly in China, Korea, and Russia, makes it impossible to overlook the identity of plans and methods, and the stubbornness with which they are applied and carried out. In Korea, China, and Russia Japan is attempting to gain a foothold on the mainland that she may not only feel absolutely safe on her islands, but also may be assured of an opportunity for the further development of her imperialistic policy as a great power. And this policy will be continued as long as the militarists and imperialists have the upper hand in Japan.

The aggressive Japanese policy of the present day is not a remote but an immediate threat to the peace of the whole world, and it is all the more immediate a threat in that it is based at present, particularly with regard to Russian territory, on French and in part on English support.

To return to the position of the Russian Far East, it is necessary to emphasize that the fact that the Japanese at the time of their stay in the country investigated all the former Russian fortresses and wherever possible made them unfit for use; that the fact that in their dealings with the authorities of the Maritime Province, and at present with the Government of the Far Eastern Republic, they constantly insisted that they would not "permit" the re-erection of the old fortresses or the construction of new ones along the Russian shore is a sufficient indication of the future plans of Japan.

They know that while they may be obliged to "limit" themselves now, to-morrow may bring the moment when they may "broaden out."

The sad story spread by the Japanese, of their "overflowing" population and the necessity of finding space in which to spread out, is a myth as far as the Russian Far East is concerned; the number of Japanese emigrants throughout the world is insignificant, even including the conquered territories of Korea and Formosa and the exploited field of Manchuria; furthermore, the climatic conditions of the Far East are not in general suitable for the Japanese—and in the Tsarist days, and even in the thriving times of the intervention, the number of Japanese citizens was very small. But those Japanese who chose the Russian Far East as their place of domicile have succeeded in making themselves at home there, as have the other foreigners in the Far East. The point, then, is not to be found in this field; the above is only a subterfuge put up for external consumption.

To trace the true outlines of the Japanese policy in the Far East and to describe the painful birth of the Far Eastern Republic is the task of the present publication.

I.

On December 30, 1917, a Japanese warship sailed into the port of Vladivostok, entirely unexpected by the Russian population of the city, and without any previous warning to the local authorities. At the same time the Japanese consul general issued the following declaration to the chairman of the Maritime Province Zemstvo Board (regional self-government) and to the mayor of Vladivostok:

> The Imperial Japanese Government, in view of the fact that under existing circumstances the Japanese living in the city of Vladivostok and its environs are in constant fear, has decided to send a warship into the port of Vladivostok. This decision was made with no other purpose than that of defending Japanese subjects, which is a duty incumbent upon the Government. The Japanese Empire, being a country truly friendly to Russia, warmly desires the consummation of a healthy development of Russia and hopes that the interests of Japan and other allied countries will be fully respected within the boundaries of Russia. The Imperial Government has, moreover, no intention whatsoever of meddling in the question of the political structure of Russia, which will be determined by the Russian people, and the object of the present expedition has no connection whatever with this question.

The sudden appearance of the Japanese and their unexpected declaration as to "noninterference" brought forth an immediate reply on the part of the Maritime Province Zemstvo Board, in which the latter pointed out that while considering that a final judgment as to the dispatch of Japanese warships to the port of Vladivostok without the consent of, and even without a warning to the local authorities, is to be passed by the central governing authorities of the Russian Republic, the Zemstvo board, for its part, being a representative of the population of the region, feels at the same time called upon to protest against this measure as a violation of the sovereign rights of the Russian Republic. After expressing its surprise on the subject of the contents of the declaration in general, the Zemstvo board said:

The defense of all persons is the first duty of the authorities installed by the Russian people, and we feel obliged to state that under their protection public order in the city of Vladivostok has not once been broken, and the appearance of reports in a number of newspapers published in Japan as to the alleged occurrence of disorders in Vladivostok are in no way in accordance with the truth, as is well known to all the foreign consuls stationed in this city.

The Japanese did not react in any way to this protest, which was the answering declaration of the Zemstvo board, but the consuls of Great Britain and the United States, after receiving copies of the protest, sent to the regional government the following communication dated January 16, 1918:

The claim made in this declaration, that public order has not been violated in Vladivostok up to the present, we acknowledge as correct. On the other hand, we consider the political situation at the present moment to be such as to cause feelings of uneasiness on the part of those countries having considerable material interests here, as to the direction that might soon be taken by affairs in this region, which justify the Governments of these countries, including Japan, to take such preliminary measures as they may consider fitted to cope with the problem of defending their interests in case the latter should actually be threatened with danger.

The appearance of the first Japanese warship was therefore not called forth by any disorders actually threatening the lives and property of Japanese citizens living in Vladivostok, but simply by uneasiness "as to the direction that might be taken by affairs in this region."

This first illegal act of the Japanese Government, to the surprise of the Russian population, was supported by the English and American consuls. Soon there appeared in the port of Vladivostok a second Japanese vessel; a short time later came an English and an American cruiser.

It was necessary to justify in some way the presence of these vessels in foreign waters, and from this moment there began a veritable bombardment of the Zemstvo board by the consular body. Every incident, of whatever significance (criminal offenses, for instance), such as may be of constant occurrence in all countries, without calling forth the arrival of special foreign vessels of war, they brought to the attention of the Zemstvo authorities, as if they were something quite extraordinary, and indicative of the insufficiency of the government as a local authority, and requiring foreign intervention. The measures taken by the very moderate local soviet of workers' delegates to defend the population from the fever of profiteering on the part of private persons and a number of commercial and financial institutions, were held to be "violations of the interests of foreigners" and also brought to the attention of the provincial government (Zemstvo board).

On April 5, 1918, the provincial government received a communication from the Japanese consul general to the effect that, "in view of the absence of sufficient security in the city to assure safety to foreign subjects," he was obliged to ask Admiral Kato to take suitable steps for the security of the life and property of foreign subjects. Simultaneously the provincial government also received a declaration of Admiral Kato, in which the latter, with expressions of his "sympathies" for friendly Russia and the Russian revolution, declared that he was obliged to take extraordinary measures because of the absence of sufficient means in the hands of the local constituted authorities to protect the interests of the population.

At night a landing party of Japanese troops came ashore. The Zemstvo board in an extraordinary session unanimously resolved to issue an emphatic protest against the landing of foreign troops.

At noon on the following day an English landing party arrived.

At 5 o'clock in the evening the consular corps visited the chairman of the Zemstvo in full force, and handed him a declaration of the following content:

There is not the slightest reason to suppose that the present landing of Japanese troops has any relation with a desire to meddle in the internal policy of Russia or to support this political party or that against the others. But in spite of the fact that we have repeatedly called the attention of the local authorities to the fact that life and property of foreigners are not sufficiently protected, we have not been able to observe that the condition of affairs has taken any turn for the better, since things have finally come to the pass where murder and injuries have been inflicted upon three Japanese citizens in broad daylight. Under these circumstances the commander of the Japanese squadron has been obliged to take the necessary measures for the defense of the Japanese. As above stated, the landing of Japanese troops was carried out exclusively with the object of protecting the Japanese, and we therefore have decided emphatically not to act against any Russian party. The Imperial Japanese Government desires merely that it shall be clear that it will always maintain the most friendly and peaceful relations with Russia.

If, therefore, the local authorities will take measures, satisfactory to us, for safeguarding the life and property of foreigners in this city, and preventing the repetition of incidents similar to those that took place recently, the Japanese Government, in view of the above-mentioned object of sending the landing party ashore, will be ready with pleasure to take up a discussion of the means of arriving at a satisfactory solution of the present question, and simultaneously the Imperial Japanese Government hopes that the Russian authorities will immediately take the steps required for a proper adjustment of the matter involving the murder and injury of Japanese.

This document necessarily received the attention of the local authorities and population, for, in addition to the outright declaration as to a Japanese landing party, indefinite and vague expressions already began to be used here; "discussion of a means of arriving at a satisfactory solution of the present question."

In his answer to the consular corps, the chairman of the Zemstvo board declared that the landing party as a means of moral uplift in the sense of preventing thefts and, in general, reestablishing peaceful conditions of life in the city, could not be considered as very successful, since the very fact of a landing of troops brought unrest into the population. Furthermore, the chairman declared that the landing party should withdraw to the ships and the city itself should be left to organize the proper security forces, all the more since the question of reorganizing the militia had already been raised and was to be settled within the next few days.

The consuls declared verbally that this solution would be satisfactory to them also, but no assurances were made that the troops would be withdrawn.

That same night pedestrians in the streets were searched by Japanese sailors, which raised a veritable storm of protest on the part of the local population as well as on that of the authorities.

Notwithstanding all protests, the foreign troops were allowed to remain in the city. Criminality was not only not prevented, but, on the contrary, began to increase visibly. It was felt by all that there were not simply criminals at work, but rather a specially organized gang.

Meanwhile American and Chinese ships were added to those of Japan and England in the harbor.

Harbin and Manchuria in general were at that time the centers for the organization of counter-revolutionary forces, grouped about Gen. Horvath, ruler of the Chinese Eastern Railway, and the Atamans—Cossack chieftains—Semenov, and Kalmykov. Semenov was in control of the station of Manchuria—a city—while the detachments of Kalmykov were already active at the station of Pogranichnaya, carrying on thefts and shootings of peaceful people under the pretext of combating bolshevism. The local population was already then fully aware of the relations existing between the Japanese and the Atamans, Semenov, and Kalmykov. Semenov was also receiving some support from the French.

II.

In June news began to arrive from Siberia of the overthrow of the soviet power by the Czecho-Slovaks, and on June 28 the Czecho-Slovaks gained control in Vladivostok and the environs. The military power was entirely in the hands of the Czech command, and only the civil power, and that not fully, was held by the Zemstvo board.

On July 6 a proclamation addressed to the population by the Allies appeared on the advertising kiosks of the city, signed by the commander in chief of the Asiatic Fleet of the United States, Admiral Knight; the commander of the special division of the Imperial Japanese Fleet, Vice Admiral Kato; Capt. Paine of the Royal British Fleet; the head of the French military mission with the Czecho-Slovak army, Col. Paris; the commander of the Chinese cruiser Hai-Yun; the commandant of the city, Capt. Badiura, of the Czecho-Slovak army.

This declaration ran as follows:

In view of the danger threatening Vladivostok and the allied forces in that city by reason of the open and secret work of Austro-German prisoners of war, the city and its environs are hereby placed under the provisional protection of the allied powers, and all measures will be taken for its defense both from external as well as internal danger.

All ordinances issued up to the present time by the Czecho-Slovak command shall remain in force.

The authority of the Zemstvo and of the city government is recognized in local affairs, but the military force and the police shall be strengthened by such numbers of allied troops as may be found necessary for eliminating the danger threatening from Austro-German agents and their influence, who, according to information in our possession, are active in the city. The present step is taken in a spirit of friendship and sympathy for the Russian people and not for any political faction or party, in the hope that the period of calm that will result will make it possible to unite again all factions in their work together, so that their harmonious and united strength may reestablish a firm and long-lived government and may cast off the yoke of the tyrannical dictatorship of the Austro-German powers, which are trying to fasten this yoke for a long time on the Russian people.

All responsible citizens should unite in the general work of maintaining order and lawfulness.

The attacks of the Czechs under the tutelage of the French and the proclamation of the Allies on July 6, sanctioning these attacks, so to speak, are the signposts marking the beginning of intervention; the preparatory period is at an end. While the arrival under very unusual circumstances of first one and then another Japanese warship at Vladivostok and the pressure exerted by the whole consular corps, as well as the landing of Japanese and English troops, were considered as perhaps a very humiliating but nevertheless temporary episode—the Czecho-Slovak action and the proclamation of July 6 immediately cause the population to view the matter in a more serious light; it became plain that some one, individually or collectively, desired to force his will upon the Russian people.

III.

The open acts of the Japanese now became merely a part of the general activities of the Allies. And it was clear, as was shown by subsequent events, that these open acts were not the chief objective of Japanese policy. The Japanese at this time were preparing a special Russian army which was to keep the civil war constantly aflame, to create a condition of perpetual uncertainty as to the morrow, and to undermine every Russian authority of whatever nature it might be, soviet, bourgeois-democratic, or monarchist.

At the head of these forces there was constantly available the bandits and murderers—the Cossack Atamans Semenov and Kalmykov, established on the highways and the railroad main line, who robbed, tortured, and shot down the peaceful population when it was so unfortunate as to meet with these criminals. And both Kalmykov and Semenov were in possession of great sums of money for the hiring of bandits among the Cossacks, former Tsarist officers who did not wish to make their peace with the revolution and had become accustomed to a dissolute life, ignorant natives of the Buriat and Mongolian tribes, as well as Chinese Khun-Khuses (bandits); they had weapons in great abundance, even machine guns.

Meanwhile conversations were going on between the allied Governments on the subject of intervention on a large scale.

At the time when the French and English were framing great plans for the renewal of the Russian participation in the war with Germany, plans closely associated with the active struggles of the Czechs and the antibolsheviks against the soviet power, the Americans gave evidence of a more sober view of things, particularly of the value of military intervention as a means to this end, and formulated the task of the American troops as the "guarding of supplies that might later be of assistance to the Russian troops and also the giving of aid such as the Russians would be ready to accept in the organization of their own self-defense." Only with this object, the United States declared, would they collaborate at the present time with the Governments of France and Great Britain in the Murmansk and Archangel region on the one hand, and "for the defense of the rear of the Czecho-Slovaks moving westward" on the other hand; but the latter was the more important consideration.

Limiting its tasks in this manner, the Government of the United States did not, at the same time, force its pessimistic view of intervention and of its function in connection with the German war upon the English and upon France, and in its declaration cited above it states that the "decisions taken by the Government of the United States on this important question do not signify that it is the thought of the United States to restrict the actions of the Governments with which we are at the present time allied, or to meddle in their independent judgments."

After the action of the Czechs in June the beginning of August saw the most definite steps taken in the history of intervention in the Russian Far East. The question as to active military intervention was settled, and the Governments of the United States, Japan, Great Britain, France, Italy, and China—the latter was also dragged in—solemnly addressed the Russian people and explained to it their true intentions and promised that "Russian territory should be inviolate at the present and in the future," "nonintervention in internal affairs," and abstention from actions that might violate "the political sovereignty of Russia."

In their declaration of August 5, 1918, the United States assumed officially the political responsibility for the entrance of the Japanese troops. In that declaration the following words appeared, literally: "The United States and Japan are the only powers now able to act in Siberia with sufficient forces to carry out even those modest aims that have been indicated above. The Government of the United States has, therefore, proposed to Japan that each of these two Governments send detachments of several thousand men to Vladivostok. These detachments should act as a sufficient force for the purpose of occupying Vladivostok and defending the Czecho-Slovaks in their western movement. The Japanese Government consented to this."

This is accompanied by assurances on the part of the United States as to the absence of any desire for conquest: "We have knowledge that the Japanese Government is giving similar assurances. The plans and intentions of the Government of the United States have been transmitted to the Governments of France, Great Britain, and Italy, and these Governments have informed the State Department of their acceptance in principle."

As a matter of fact, the Japanese on the following day published a solemn declaration in which they made an almost identical statement: "The Allies naturally can not remain indifferent to the unfortunate course of events (the Czecho-Slovak affair), and a certain number of allied troops have already received orders to proceed to Vladivostok. Likewise the Government of the United States, conscious of the seriousness of the situation, recently made to the Japanese Government the proposal to send troops immediately, with the object of easing the situation of the Czecho-Slovak forces. The Japanese Government, desiring to meet the wishes of the American Government half way and, likewise, to act in harmony with its allies in this expedition, decided to proceed at once to forward the necessary troops for this purpose."

The solemn declaration goes on to say: "The Government confirms its declaration of its policy of respect for the territorial integrity of Russia and its abstention from any meddling in Russia's internal affairs and policies. In addition, it declares that immediately upon the realization of the above-mentioned aims it will evacuate all its troops from Russian territory."

The English and French gave similar guaranties, although they, particularly the French, were already definitely committed to give "assistance" to antibolshevik elements in the interests of a "reconstruction of Russia" and her return to the fold of the Allies. In the declaration signed by Regnaud it is said: "France, like her allies, could not fail to answer the call of the sane elements of the Russian people who remain faithful to their allied obligations and who aim still to put an end to the bolshevik disorganization, which brought about the dismemberment and the ruin of Russia, betrayed to the Germans."

IV.

On August 11 the Twelfth Japanese Division landed at Vladivostok, and on August 18 the commander in chief of the Japanese expeditionary forces, Gen. Otani, with his staff, became the nominal head of all the allied forces. In September American forces also began to arrive.

Meanwhile the Czechs were moving in an easterly direction, everywhere overthrowing the Siberian soviet authorities, which they took by surprise, and preparing the way for the arrival of the Allies. The Japanese troops were moving westward into Transbaikalia and beyond, taking possession of the railroad, creating a western basis for themselves in Chita, in which city the Third Division arrived at the end of December. Behind the Japanese there followed closely Ataman Semenov, at that time quartered at the station of Manchuria, whither he had repaired after the defeat inflicted upon him by the Siberian soviet troops and volunteer forces. Semenov, following upon the Japanese, got as far as Chita and settled down on the main line of the Transbaikal Railroad.

And then, coming immediately after the Czechs and Japanese, who had turned their attention to Khabarovsk in the middle of August, Ataman Kalmykov, who had "fought" at the station of Pogranichnaya (it is extremely characteristic of these "champions against bolshevism" that every one of them took up his headquarters on the Chinese border, to which he would again withdraw when the slightest pressure was put upon him), penetrated to the Khabarovsk front, where, together with the Japanese, Czechs, and English (the Japanese were in the majority), he participated in the offensive against the hastily organized forces of the soviet of workers and peasants which were defending Khabarovsk. After the evacuation of the soviet army, the Japanese, together with Kalmykov, entered the city of Khabarovsk on August 16 and established themselves there.

The soviet troops retreated to Blagovyeshchensk, to which the Japanese directed a portion of their forces. On September 18 the Japanese entered the city, and on September 24 also entered Zeya. There were no important battles, for the soviet troops declined to give battle. The Fourteenth Japanese Division was assigned to the Amur district, and soon arrived there.

V.

A very curious feature of the Japanese policy, and one that later became very expensive to the population, at once made itself apparent: Wherever they came, whether it was Khabarovsk, the Amur district, Transbaikalia, or the Maritime Province, they had behind them "Russian troops" and "the Russian people," impersonated by the most desperate bandits and military criminal elements, who were in Japanese pay, were completely dependent on the Japanese, and carried out all steps necessary for the realization of the secret plans of Japan. To other foreigners living in that region the picture became one of uninterrupted civil war and disorder, requiring the presence of foreign troops and permitting the Japanese forces under these circumstances to appear as the "benefactors" of the peaceful Russian population. After the first weeks of the joint occupation of Russian territory by allied troops, differences between the Americans and the Japanese became quickly apparent. The latter quite openly declared their intention to hold the railroad in their own hands. These differences led to a Japanese-American agreement in February, 1919, which was reached after long preliminaries, and to an agreement between the Allies, of March 14, 1919, by virtue of which there was formed an inter-allied railroad commission, which took it upon itself to "guard the railroad." (The Chinese Eastern, the Usuri, and the Siberian Railroads are meant.) In the declaration, point 5 stated: "The application of the present agreement shall cease with the recall of foreign troops from Siberia, and all foreign specialists on the railroad will also then be immediately recalled. We desire to emphasize the principle that the plan outlined above will be carried out without any violation whatever of the sovereign rights of the Russian people and in cooperation with the Russian Railroad personnel." The Japanese were obliged to yield the supreme technical management of the railroads to the Americans, who had arrived in Siberia even before the fall of the Kerensky government.

The Japanese assumed the guardianship over the Transbaikalia and Amur sections of the railroad and of a portion of the Usuri Railroad, which work was carried out jointly with detachments of Russian counter-revolutionaries organized by them. The Americans guarded a portion of the Usuri Railroad and a portion of the Transbaikalia Railroad near Verkhne-Udinsk.

VI.

In this manner the Japanese, uninterruptedly enlarging the zone occupied by their army under various pretexts (frequently in the form of "reliefs" of regiments and divisions), were permanently settled in the Maritime Province, in the Amur region, in Transbaikalia, and were moving into the Province of Irkutsk and to the west of that Province, with as yet small forces.

But this was not sufficient for them. On the basis of a military agreement with Japan, in August, 1918, China, owing to war conditions, which completely absorbed the Allies in their own affairs, was ceaselessly under Japanese pressure, and the Japanese obtained the legal right to establish themselves on the Chinese Eastern Railroad and to assume the guardianship of the road, and made use of their sojourn there (they held the Chinese Eastern Railway for about two years) to consolidate themselves firmly throughout northern Manchuria.

The truthfulness of the Japanese assurances in their solemn declaration of August 6, 1918, became apparent after only a few days, when, sending their troops into Manchuria, they issued their famous communique of August 13, 1918, to the chairman of the Zemstvo board. In this declaration the Japanese exposed the fact that they had entered the territory of the Russian Far East with ulterior motives and plans of their own. While, in their declaration of August 6, the Japanese referred only to the necessity of aiding the Czecho-Slovaks as the cause for intervention, their communique of August 13 advances an entirely new factor, namely, the menace threatening them in northern Manchuria. This document literally declares:

The attention of the Japanese Government was recently called to the growing activity of armed German and Austro-Hungarian prisoners in Siberia along the Manchurian boundary. These prisoners, actually standing at the head of the soviet armies, are at present putting pressure upon the Chinese border in the direction of the city of Manchuria, and this impending danger has obligated a considerable number of Chinese and Japanese inhabitants to seek safety in flight. The situation threatens Chinese territory with immediate danger and in no less serious degree is a menace to Japan.

Japan is bound to China by ties of intimate friendship. Both Governments discussed the policy that should be followed in the present state of affairs and agreed, as an extraordinary provisional measure, on the sending of a detachment of Japanese troops, at present stationed in southern Manchuria, into the city of Manchuria. This transfer of troops is based upon the harmonious collaboration of China and Japan in the face of the threatening danger, and in undertaking it the Japanese Government will faithfully observe both the sovereignty of China and the rights and interests of the local population. The Japanese Government is happy to believe that these measures will to a considerable degree aid in strengthening these relations, based on mutual confidence and good faith.

VII.

At the time when the Japanese hirelings, Semenov and Kalmykov, under the protection of the Japanese, were continuing their task of "fighting bolshevism"—that is, were robbing, pillaging, and murdering the peaceful population—the Japanese were deluging all the villages, and their excesses reached such a point that the entire peasant population began to suffer under their yoke and to turn to their still remaining Russian "authorities," to the Zemstvo boards, for help. Simultaneously the Japanese organized the Chinese Khun-Khuzes (bandits) and directed their assault on the Russian population, and together with them engaged in a complete terrorization of the Russian Far East, both in a military and in an economic way. Everywhere they demanded from the Volost Zemstvo boards information as to the number of inhabitants in the Volost, the number of lands of the various categories, cattle, fowl, etc. All the numerous appeals of the Volost Zemstvo boards to the regional Zemstvo boards would end in the same way: "In reporting the above, the board begs that Russian citizens be protected from violations on the part of armed Japanese detachments."

In order to describe more concretely the actions of the Japanese in 1918 and 1919 (which actions continue to the present day), it is interesting to quote extracts from some of the numerous resolutions of the village communities. The peasants, observing the powerlessness of the Russian authorities, in their simplicity often resolved to appeal to the "American" and "Chinese" consuls in Vladivostok for aid and protection:

In view of the present condition of affairs, when Japanese troops are quartered in Ivanovka (a village of the county of Nikolsk-Usurisk, Maritime Province), and of their attitude toward the inhabitants of the village, particularly the attitude of the interpreter of the Japanese command, a Korean, we have resolved to appeal in the present document to the American and Chinese consul in the city of Vladivostok with the request to relieve the peaceful population of the violations imposed upon it by Japanese troops, since, we repeat, it is impossible for the population even to live in peace, and it will be obliged to leave its homes and escape to wherever it can.

Here are several facts proving the above statement. The Japanese soldiers, without any cause or reason, killed 10 pigs, destroyed a number of gardens, obtained by force and by threatening with weapons, produce, particularly eggs, fowl, etc., and where such was not forthcoming, beat up the farmers. They beat a number of truckmen, when their horses, pulling a heavy load, did not succeed in keeping up with other horses which were stronger. The inhabitants of Ivanovka have been taken away from their regular occupations and are now occupied chiefly in transporting Japanese troops and their supplies; the Japanese soldiers and their Korean drivers beat up the inhabitants of the village, men and women as well as children, frequently using their weapons for the purpose. In the last few days there were beaten up Daniel Romanchenko, 52 years of age; Titus Gerasimenko, 47 years old; the citizen of Ivanovka, Varava, 84 years old, was killed; Nikonor Troyan, 16 years old, was killed by drowning; and finally the village head, Yurchenko, 60 years old, was killed while in the performance of his duties. Signed, October 7, 1919, by the true signatures of 29 citizens of the village of Ivanovka.

These are not isolated facts, but represents a system then practiced and now still practiced by the Japanese. We quote below a number of documents giving information that was gathered by the local authorities.

On October 13, 1919, in answer to an inquiry on the Japanese atrocities in the village of Nikolayevka, Nikolsk-Usurisk County, Maritime Province, the following appears in document 3:

On September 3, in the village of Nikolayevka, I, the chairman of the Nikolayevsk Village Committee, Michael Loboda, made an inquiry, together with the undersigned witnesses and appraisers, the citizens of the village of Nikolayevka, Timofei Korpenko, and Loka Shkolin, on the burning of Barsukov's farmhouse.

On July 5, 1919, O. S., early in the morning, a detachment of Japanese troops arriving, they set fire to Maxim Barsukov's shed and then also to the four remaining huts, in which Nastasya Barsukov, the wife of Vasil Barsukov, and Matrena Barsukov, the wife of Ivan Barsukov, were burned to death; they killed on the same spot Vasily Moiseyevich Barsukov and Simion Vavilovich Barsukov; Nikolai Barsukov was wounded and later died of his wounds. The damage done by the fire is estimated at 191,154 rubles (Siberian paper money).

Document 6: The Japanese came to Ivanovka on July 22, 1919, and took possession of the Zemstvo Board building and school. After seizing the building they threw around the benches and then broke 26 of them, also five blackboards, and burned three cords of wood. Of school supplies are missing 200 copy books, 120 pencils, 300 pens; textbooks and readers were destroyed, but it is impossible to estimate the number of the latter, as the catalogues also have been destroyed. The losses of the school amount to about 4,665 rubles.

In the Zemstvo Board building they burned five cords of wood of a value of about 3,000 rubles. The Japanese staff was asked to pay 1,000 rubles monthly for their quarters for August and September, in all 2,000 rubles, but refused to do so.

From the report of the head of the Khabarovsk municipal militia, January 12, 1920, addressed to the chief of Khabarovsk County:

Record of preliminary investigation:

On January 8, 1920, I, Michael Chebyarov, militiaman of the second district of the guard of the Amur Railroad, posted at station Volochayevka of the aforesaid railroad, on the basis of articles 252 and 253 of the criminal law, proceeded with an inquiry concerning the killing of Joseph Melnikov by Japanese soldiers, in which inquiry it transpired that on January 8 of the current year, after the armored train No. 101 had arrived from Khabarovsk at the station Volochayevka, there was passing at a distance of 20 sazhen (140 feet) opposite the station Volochayevka, in a sleigh drawn by a horse, the family of Joseph Melnikov, the road surveyor of the seventh precinct of the road service, consisting of four boys, the youngest of whom was 4 and the oldest 15 years old; at that time part of the Japanese soldiers left the armored train and began to shoot at the aforesaid persons passing in the sleigh, mortally wounding in the head above the left temple the 15-year-old Joseph Melnikov and killing instantly the horse belonging to Michael Akimov, citizen of the village of Volochayevka.

From the report of the head of the Khabarovsk municipal militia, January 12, 1920, addressed to the chief of the Khabarovsk district:

I report that on January 3, 1920, the Japanese officer, Heida Tonaki, fired his revolver at the militiaman of the second precinct, Gussev, on guard at his post. Although the shot was fired at close range, the bullet did not enter the militiaman's body. The shooter was arrested by the head of the fourth precinct of militia in my charge and his Smith & Wesson revolver taken away from him. When questioned as to the reason for discharging his weapon, the Japanese officer answered, "My fun."

From a document dated February 6, 1920, in the village of Knyaze Volkonskoye, drawn up by the representatives of the local authorities:

On January 8, 1920, I, Michael Chebyarov, militiaman of the second, the settlement Knyazevolkonky, from the direction of the village of Konstantinovka, opened fire at a distance of about 1 verst, and thus destroyed the building of the Volost Zemstvo Board, which was struck by a number of shells.

After ceasing fire the Japanese detachment, entering the village itself, began a machine-gun fire in the first, second, and third streets and then conducted an individual search of the peaceful inhabitants, violating inoffensive women and young girls and also stealing the property of peaceful citizens. They then proceeded to burn down dwellings and several structures belonging to peaceful citizens, as well as a number of buildings of government institutions.

According to a telegram of the head of this section of the Usuri Railway Service, dated February 25, 1920, the Japanese troops shot and otherwise killed the following persons: "Near the Gedika junction the State machine worker, Fedor Dveryak, was killed on January 10; on January 24 the laborer Ivan Bezkrovny was shot at the station of Vyazenskaya; and on February 1, in the 608-verst guardhouse, the right-of-way worker, Gordey Tsibunsky, was killed, with his wife and two children."

Report 102 of the Gondatin village committee, Vedensk County, Iman District, Maritime Province: Drawn up September 24, 1918:

We again ask the body of the Iman district Zemstvo board to place the following matter before whom it may concern: Japanese soldiers guarding the bridge between the stations of Iman and Guboryevo, Usuri Railway, steal everything that has value and that pleases them, shoot at people in order that they may not interfere with their seizures of fowl, eggs, bread, sugar, tea, matches, knives, bowls, and government property, which has been brought by the Red Army men from the German front, as well as shotguns, powder, and caps. They take things not because they need them but because they please their fancy; they ransack trunks, breaking their locks to do so; they attack women, demanding what is impossible and shameful for Russian persons; and we have been reduced to the most wretched situation, not having expected such actions from the Japanese people. We urgently beg the Japanese consul to put an end to the violations and misdeeds perpetrated by the Japanese soldiers. (There follow the signatures of the inhabitants.)

The above specimens of complaints are not specially chosen and are not the most outrageous. Among the other records, we have documents that it is impossible to read with any peace of mind, and we can produce thousands of such complaints, all of them officially certified. To publish all these documents would be to fill thousands of volumes of human wretchedness.

All these things the Japanese themselves did, and this is what they called "fighting bolshevism."

They were ably seconded by their hirelings, the bandits Kalmykov and Semenov, who robbed, tortured, and murdered thousands of people without distinction of sex or age, and that also was called "fighting bolshevism."

VIII.

Murderers and criminal elements who escaped the local authorities always found protection in the Japanese staff, and if they were arrested were defended by the Japanese, who declared that these were their agents. As a specimen we may introduce a copy of a telegram, No. 98, of the Nikolsk authorities, dated September 8, 1920:

I arrested on this day Karl Belyayev, who in Spassk murdered Andreyev, Kustovinov, and Kalinichenko (three representatives of the Zemstvo board authorities, who later turned out to have been burned by White Guards in the furnace of their locomotive). The local Japanese command freed the prisoner and took him under its protection, depriving me of the right to arrest him, Belyayev, as a criminal offender. This intercession of the local Japanese authorities in favor of criminal persons is not the first case. I urgently request the punishment of illegal acts of intervention on the part of the Japanese command in the business of the Russian authorities.

(Signed) SOLOGUBENKO.

IX.

Returning to the general allied intervention, aside from that of the Japanese, we must distinguish between two policies: The Anglo-French policy and the American policy, or the active and the passive policy.

France and England, in the presence of their military representatives (the English general, Knox, and others, for example), intended to make use of the situation to wage a cruel and bloody war against the soviet power and understood perfectly well that this determined struggle against the soviet power would have to be carried on, not by democrats but only by irreconcilable monarchists and the remnants of the bourgeois-feudal Russia, who opposed to the ideas of the revolution the old ideas (and practices) of the autocratic régime that had been born in blood and iron.

When, after the Czecho-Slovak revolt, the moderate democratic elements and a portion of the right socialists set up their power in the Provinces, and after the Ufa conference of the members of the constituent assembly created the directorate in Omsk, the center of Siberia, and when simultaneously the monarchist elements, with foreign support, became strong enough to bring about a coup d'état and to overthrow the directorate, the English and the French, who had already been in sympathy with them and given them support, were doing their best to bring about the success of an extremely reactionary administration—the rule of Admiral Kolchak.

What Kalmykov was doing in Khabarovsk, and Semenov in Chita, became the rule all over Siberia as soon as this new power, based upon foreign bayonets, was strengthened; whipping, shootings of carloads of people with machine guns, treacherous assassination of all the elements that were more or less democratically inclined, and debauchery of the reactionary soldiery in the villages which in many places were converted into cemeteries and ash heaps, became a "normal" condition for the Siberian population.

X.

But even then, with the fatal policy of the Allies as the background, the Japanese policy did not lose its originality.

With its own problems in view and with such an excellent opportunity to come in "by invitation," Japan could not allow any other power, not even a kindred monarchy, to fortify itself there. A strong Russian power meant a curtailment of her program; Russia, torn by internal strife, guaranteed the carrying out of her policy of a great power aiming at the creation of a great Japan at another's cost.

For this purpose, as was already pointed out, were called into existence Semenov and Kalmykov, and were kept at different places, both to be used for the same job. At the moment they were to weaken the Central Omsk Government, to hinder its work. At the same time the Omsk Government was made use of in every possible way—its gold reserve was drained, its cotton, iron, copper, etc., were exported for next to nothing.

At last the entire population, including many antibolsheviks, in despair took to arms and, hiding in outlying woods, began a guerilla warfare with the reactionary and criminal power imposed on them from outside.

XI.

At the same time Kolchak's army, after serious clashes with the red army, began to thin out and retreated; the greater part, mostly peasants, went over to the reds, the rest retreated or fled.

The Czecho-Slovaks, seeing the shameful part they had played, realizing that they were nothing but cat's-paws in the hands of reaction, began to demand immediate repatriation and refused to do further fighting.

Indeed, there was nothing else to be done; the victorious red army was everywhere met by the population with enthusiasm as the liberator from the horrible nightmare of Kolchak's rule, and grew from day to day.

Not to retreat after discontinuing to fight meant complete rout and disaster.

The Czecho-Slovaks naturally preferred the retreat and began to move eastward. The Allies, realizing the failure of military intervention, particularly after the successful end of the war with Germany, did not particularly detain the Czecho-Slovaks. Sufficient use had already been made of them.

The English, French, Czecho-Slovaks, Italians began to leave Russian territory. The counter-revolutionists were in despair and called to Japan as the "only" country that could save "Russia," i. e., counter-revolution. And doing so, they cursed America. The fact that America, as represented by the commander of the American forces, William S. Graves, did not find it possible, remaining true to the declaration of August 6, 1918, to support actively the lawless régime of the various Kolchaks, Rozanovs, Ivanov-Rinovs, etc., brought about the hatred of these monarchist remnants toward Americans. In their prostitute press, which was engaged in singing praises to "noble Japan" and to the aid already rendered to "the Russian people" (as represented by all these generals—the Semenovs, Kalmykovs), they were outdoing one another in slinging mud at the American forces in America. They all carried one motto—alliance of monarchist Japan with Siberian and Russian monarchist counter-revolution. But these "mouthings" too went for naught—they were swept away by popular indignation.

XII.

Kolchak's rule was overthrown everywhere; first in the west and later in the east (in the Maritime and Amur Provinces). On January 31 Gen. Rosanov, Kolchak's appointee, was overthrown in Vladivostok, and in February the same happened to Kolchak's administration on the Amur.

Japan's policy remained the same as ever. On January 31 an attempt was made to repeat the experience of November 16, 1919, during the so-called Gaida insurrection in Vladivostok, where the insurgents were defeated only through the aid given to Kolchak's forces by the Japanese; as a result several hundred men were killed by machine guns. This time, during the revolt, when almost the entire Kolchak forces went over to the side of the Democratic Zemstvo Government, which was fighting Kolchak, on the streets together with Japanese forces appeared also Americans, which prevented the Japanese from interfering in the events, and in accordance with the declaration of their Government insisted on their (the Japanese) remaining neutral.

A similar attempt to prevent the overthrow of Kolchak's rule was made by the Japanese in the Amur Provinces, but was ineffective owing to the persistent and determined activity of the revolutionaries.

XIII.

When the forces of the Zemstvo administration of the Maritime Province, which proclaimed itself as the provisional government, were approaching Khabarovsk to seize or expel Ataman Kalmykov, the Japanese, which, under the circumstances could not act openly, took up a position of secret military aid. In a telegram from Bulgakov, the commander of the attacking Zemstvo army, dated February 21, 1920, No. 201, addressed to the commander in chief of the forces of the provisional governments, the following was stated: In order to hamper the progress of his army Japanese soldiers, during the night of February 12, had cut up the paving of the bridge and the stairs near the bridge on the six hundred and eighty-first verst and laid the cut-up timber on the bridge girders between the rails; on top of this they piled up straw and set fire to it. Very coolly the Japanese soldiers kept throwing pieces of wood on the bonfire. When this was brought to the attention of Gen. Yamada, in command of the Japanese forces in Khabarovsk, he did not try to evade the question, but replied that he was forced to stop the entry of revolutionary forces in Khabarovsk, and therefore gave the order to burn two bridges. Still Kalmykov was chased out, notwithstanding the help of the Japanese. He crossed the Chinese border, where he shot part of his army which tried to leave him, and later was himself interned by the Chinese. (Some time later in trying to escape he was killed by Chinese soldiers.)

XIV.

In the Amur Province, where the Japanese soldiers were particularly suffering from the cold and where they outdid the other troops in their atrocities toward the population (in one village alone, Ivanovka, several hundred people were shot down by machine guns and burned to death), thus arousing the entire population against them—the rich and the poor, the peasants, the Cossacks, and the townspeople—the position of the Japanese became too unsafe and they decided to evacuate the territory for the time being. Evacuation began toward the end of February.

XV.

In the meantime in the districts close to the Japanese position (Pribaikalia) guerrilla detachments in clashes with Semenov forces routed the latter and occupied the city of Verkhne-Udinsk. The attempt to capture Chita was unsuccessful owing to the active support the Japanese gave to Semenov.

In Verkhne-Udinsk the "Provisional Zemstvo Government of Pribaikalia" was established and announced its aim—to clear the entire Province of Transbaikalia from Semenov's forces.

XVI.

At the end of March, 1920, the Japanese announced that they would not allow the Red troops to pass farther east and demanded that these troops be moved from the station of Gyrshelun to the station of Khilok on the Transbaikal Railway, declaring at the same time that they have nothing against the presence of local forces of the newly established local government in Verkhne-Udinsk, i. e., the Zemstvo Government of Pribaikalia. Thus the Japanese attempted to establish by force a buffer zone between themselves and Soviet Russia.

XVII.

On March 13 an agreement was concluded between the Czecho-Slovak forces—which had come to an understanding with the Red army—and the Provisional Zemstvo Government of Pribaikalia, whereby the government undertook to assist the Czechs in hastening their departure, to carry on no military actions in the territory of the railway line, and not to destroy the tracks during the transportation of Czecho-Slovak troops along the line. The Czechs on their part undertook to hand over, after their last detachments shall have passed, all railroad bridges and constructions in complete order and to carry away none of the military property of Kolchak's army. Together with the Czechs were also leaving Rumanian, Latvian, and Jugoslavian troops.

XVIII.

While the new democratic authorities were endeavoring to do everything possible to hasten the departure of the Czechs, the Japanese and their protégés, the Semenov forces, were using all possible means to hamper their movement along the Transbaikal and Chinese Eastern Railways. On April 14, 1920, the interallied technical board made a vigorous protest against the actions of the Japanese and the Semenov forces, while the interallied railway committee was forced to send its representative, Mr. Smith, an American, to Transbaikalia to investigate why the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovaks was being held up. As a result of his report, made upon his return, all the representatives of the interallied committee, with the exception of the Japanese, decided to send to their respective Governments an identical telegram, in which they accused the Semenov forces and the Japanese of violating the decisions of the technical railway board and committee and of actually holding up the movement of the Czecho-Slovaks. Paragraph 3 of this telegram says: "The Japanese military forces, by placing Japanese detachments at such points of the Chinese Eastern Railway, which in accordance with an interallied agreement, must be guarded by Chinese troops, and also by permitting their troops to interfere in railroad matters, have caused conflicts, the consequences of which have been unnecessary victims among Russian, Chinese, and Czecho-Slovak citizens, and the movement of trains has suffered. In Imianpo, a station on the Chinese Eastern Railway, the Japanese shot and killed several Russian railway men; similar attempts were made in Khailar, where shots were exchanged between Chinese and Japanese troops."

If these were the feelings of the official representatives of the allied powers, it is easy to imagine the state of mind of the population, which had to bear the brunt of the situation on its shoulders.

The evacuation continued normally. The Americans announced the forthcoming evacuation of their troops.

XIX.

On March 2, 1920, the provisional government of the Maritime Zemstvo board handed to Count Matsudaira, counsellor of the Japanese diplomatic mission in Siberia, a note for transmission to the Japanese Imperial Government. This note pointed out that with the downfall of the Kolchak forces, order was established everywhere and civil war ended, that every assistance is being rendered in the matter of evacuating the Czecho-Slovaks, and that there was, therefore, no further reason for continuing the intervention which was so obnoxious to the population. The note further stated that, unfortunately, not all the participants in the intervention recognized the change in the situation, and that while some of the Allies withdrew, and others were preparing to withdraw, the Japanese Government increased its forces (the number of Japanese troops reached 70,000). The note continued: "This last circumstance defines the responsible rôle played by the Japanese Government in continuing and even increasing the intervention, which now assumes the character of a single-handed forcible action against the will of the people. The Zemstvo Government considers the further continuation of intervention by the Japanese Government as a violation of the sovereign rights of Russia in the Far East and declares that in carrying out their intervention the Japanese were supporting the lawless régime of Kolchak, Semenov, and Kalmykov, that the Japanese were shooting Russian citizens, burning villages, etc., and that all this prevents the resumption of normal conditions of life in the Russian Far East." The note concluded with two demands: (1) to complete the announced evacuation of the Amur Province and (2) to commence immediately a new and rapid evacuation of the territory of the Russian Far East by the Japanese forces.

The Japanese did not answer, and at the same time announced to the outer world that the situation of the Czecho-Slovak forces held up their evacuation.

XX.

On March 8, 1920, the Provisional Government addressed a request to the diplomatic representative of Czechoslovakia in Siberia in which, after pointing out that the Japanese Government had announced that the presence and even the increase of Japanese troops was necessary principally in order to guarantee safe and uninterrupted passage of the Czech troops, information was asked as to "whether the successful evacuation of Czech troops, in spite of all the necessary measures in this direction taken by the Provisional Government, actually depended upon the presence and constant increase of Japanese troops on the territory of our Far East."

To this, on March 10, Dr. Girsa, plenipotentiary minister of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, replied the following: "The difficulties in evacuating the Czecho-Slovak troops at first met with on the part of the soviet government in the region west of Irkutsk have been removed by mutual agreement between Czecho-Slovak and soviet troops"; "that in the Far East there were no obstacles placed on the way, but on the contrary, every possible assistance was rendered everywhere," for which he considered it his duty to express his thanks.

The Japanese, however, assiduously continuing their work against the interests of the population, preferred to ignore this official refutation of the statement made by the Japanese Government, as contained in the above-stated inquiry of the Provisional Government of March 8.

XXI.

The strained relations between the Japanese and the local population were getting worse from day to day as a result of the unceasing brutality of the Japanese.

On March 27 the Provisional Government handed in a memorandum setting forth the Japanese atrocities against the Russian people—arrests, murders, incendiarism.

As long as the Japanese were carrying out their policy along the railway line, before the eyes of all the world, they tried to mask their intentions. But in a far away corner on the Pacific coast, in Nikolayevsk on the Amur, which was cut off from the seat of the Government and from the rest of the population, the Japanese acted quite openly. There was no one for whom it was necessary to invent special pretexts for their course of action, and the Russian population could be trampled upon without any constraint.

Placing the fact of the dispatch of Japanese soldiers to this far away region side by side with the official reason given for such dispatch in the Japanese declarations, one unusual circumstance immediately presents itself, namely, there were no Czecho-Slovaks in Nikolayevsk on the Amur to be saved; by reason of the very geographic position of Nikolayevsk there could be no danger to Manchuria; furthermore, the Russians and the Japanese had always lived there at peace with each other. And nevertheless soldiers were sent there, several hundreds of them.

As everywhere else, the population of Nikolayevsk was fighting the Kolchak and Semenov forces, and as everywhere else, too, the Japanese supported the latter against the population. When the news of the complete rout of Kolchak reached Nikolayevsk, the local partisan detachment, which had kept up the fight with the White Guards, whom the Japanese held completely under their sway, captured the local fortress Chnyriakh, and after besieging the town for a month, had thrice asked them to surrender, proposing to the Japanese to cease their armed intervention, so as to avoid the necessity of using the long range fortress artillery and endangering the city and its population. The first peaceful offer was ignored by the Japanese. Sorokin, the truce bearer sent by the partisan forces, was killed. The second offer was carried to the Japanese in Nikolayevsk by three truce bearers, two Chinese and one Russian (Orlov); instead of giving an answer, the Japanese again killed the Russian truce bearer, after submitting him to horrible tortures. His eyes were gouged out, his nose and toes burned, and his back cut up. His body was afterwards disinterred, when the partisans entered the city, and in the presence of foreign representatives an autopsy was performed in order to prove the act of atrocity committed by the Japanese and the manner in which the latter adhere to rules of truce. The third offer was made after the Japanese handed to the partisans the declaration of Gen. Siramidsu, commander of the Japanese forces in Khabarovsk, to the effect that it was the intention of the Japanese to remain neutral in the future. The offer was accompanied by a request to make clear certain points in the declaration, and a notification that should the besieged refuse to surrender, the partisans would be forced to bombard the city. No answer came; and only after a day's bombardment the Japanese sent a truce bearer, an old Russian peasant.

There was no written offer from the Japanese; verbally the messenger explained that they would like to commence peace negotiations. The staff of the partisan forces handed the messenger its answer agreeing to such peace negotiations with an offer immediately to cease military activities and asking the Japanese to send representatives to begin negotiations on February 24. On the basis of Gen. Siramidsu's declaration, the Japanese were asked to cease military activities and to surrender the city on the following conditions: (1) Unconditional fulfillment by the Japanese command of Gen. Siramidsu's declaration regarding noninterference in internal affairs; (2) complete disarming of the White Guard garrison in Nikoloyevsk and delivery of all their arms and munitions, place of delivery to be indicated subsequently; (3) until the entry into the city of the partisan forces and until all strategic points would be occupied by them, these were to be held by Japanese; (4) upon fulfillment of above, the Japanese forces were to surrender all sentries to the partisan forces and to retreat to quarters assigned to them. The question of quarters was to be decided by the Japanese and the Russian (partisan) commands by mutual consent. The conditions were accepted, peace was signed by representatives of the Japanese command, of the White Guards, of the city administration, and of the partisans. On February 29 the partisans entered the city and the White Guards gave up their arms—300 rifles, four 3-inch guns with shells, and 3 projectors. Several of their leaders, fearing court-martial, committed suicide. The leading counter-revolutionists and all the White Guard officers were arrested. Always willing to meet the Japanese halfway, the partisans permitted them to have sentries within their own forces and quarters, thus relieving them from carrying out the last paragraph of the agreement. The Japanese walked freely around the city, armed. The relations were most friendly. All requests on the part of the Japanese about certain privileges or regarding delivery of foodstuffs, etc., were gladly granted. The Japanese, too, were very courteous and gave assurances of sincere friendship.

Two weeks passed from the day when the city was occupied and peace and quiet seemed to have been securely established. As before, the Japanese had sentries posted not only near their headquarters but almost near every house where the Japanese were stationed. Japanese patrols walked around the city freely.

At 3 o'clock in the night of March 12 a detachment of Japanese soldiers stationed in the city, contrary to the truce agreement concluded with the partisans, quite suddenly surrounded and besieged the headquarters of the partisan army, the artillery positions and the barracks, and simultaneously opened fire at all these points. The main attack was made on the headquarters, at which the Japanese directed a barrage fire of rifles, machine guns, and incendiary bombs which set ablaze the building from all sides. In the building at the time were present Triapitsyn, commander of the partisan army; Naumov, chief of the staff; and others; also a number of employees and their children. The commander succeeded in sending a telephone message to the Chnyrakh Fortress and to the central military telephone station. After that the wires were cut. Escape from the burning building surrounded by the Japanese, who did not stop firing for a second, was impossible, and those inside began to suffocate in the smoke. The commander and many others were wounded; two were killed. To remain in the building any longer was impossible. It was decided to leave and to make a dash for the next building. This was done. In running across, almost everyone was wounded, including Tryapitsyn, who was wounded for the second time; four were killed. The secretary, Cherny, and other three employees perished in the burning building. The house to which they escaped was also under constant fire. In spite of the suddenness of the attack, the partisans began to gather, donning their clothes on the run, forming into units, and starting to repulse the attack. The Third Company was the first to approach the headquarters in chain formation.

Under their rifle fire the Japanese began to retreat. Thanks to the courage and self-sacrifice of the commanding personnel and the firm stand of the partisan soldiers, the Japanese were thrown into disorder and began to give up point after point. The battle lasted incessantly for two days (March 13 and 14) amid the most ferocious fighting. The Japanese concentrated their main forces in their consulate, in the barracks and garrison quarters. The Japanese civil population took part in the attack, arms in hand. Toward the evening of March 14 the affair was almost finished with the exception of one Japanese detachment which occupied the brick barracks. Just then an order came from Gen. Yamada, commander of the Japanese forces in Khabarovsk to the commander of the Japanese detachment, immediately to cease hostilities and to conclude a truce. The order was transmitted to the Japanese through a captured interpreter. The Japanese agreed to cease hostilities and to give up their arms. At noon of March 15 the Japanese remaining in the barracks hoisted a white flag and surrendered, 130 of them, who were taken prisoners.

Of the partisans, 50 were dead and more than 100 wounded.

These are, in short, the main features of the events of Nikolayevsk.

A population that is not at all inclined to consider itself "conquered" and that is incapable of remaining in the condition of slaves, can not be insulted and mistreated with impunity. There is a limit to every endurance, but in Nikolayevsk there was not only human patience at stake—there life itself had to be protected against cruel and cunning "guests" who felt themselves as masters of a land which they considered already subjugated. When the partisans learned of a new movement of Japanese "reinforcements" coming up from Alexandrovsk in Sakhalin, with the usual trail of cruelties, and knowing from past experience what awaited them upon the arrival of these reinforcements they decided to leave the city, and in their exasperation they killed the remaining Japanese in revenge for the execution of partisans then going on in Sakhalin.

The frenzied partisan leaders did not spare even the Russian population. But they were punished by the partisans themselves after their retreat from Nikolayevsk, which was occupied by the Japanese. They were arrested for the crimes committed and sentenced to be executed. The sentence was carried out.

That the behavior of the Japanese in Nikolayevsk was not an accident is testified by similar occurrences which took place all through the Maritime Province during April.

The Japanese military party was up in arms. "The souls of the dead" of Nikolayevsk cried for vengeance and went so far as to cause the seizure of the Sakhalin territory. The Japanese Government sent a further punitive expedition to Nikolayevsk to complete the work begun.

The majority of the remaining Russian population was transferred to Vladivostok, and Nikolayevsk was occupied by the Japanese. Of particular interest is also the fact that even before any "events" took place in Nikolayevsk the Japanese warship Mikasa arrived there, and under the signature of the commander of the ship, Capt. H. Mukai, an appeal was issued to the population of Nikolayevsk dated as early as February 20, 1920:

In order to avoid any misunderstanding that might arise through the unexpected appearance of our vessels in these waters, as senior commander I consider it timely to give an explanation of our present visit. In the middle of January information reached us regarding a political change taking place here, and soon thereafter various disquieting rumors began to reach us about the dangers threatening the lives and interests of the Japanese residing in this territory. In view of the fact that all communication is cut off with this part of the country we had no possibility of ascertaining the true state of affairs.

Disturbed by this situation and obliged to take measures for the protection of its nationals, the Imperial Japanese Government finally decided, in spite of all climatic difficulties, to dispatch us here for the sole above stated purpose, without any intention whatsoever of interfering in the internal affairs of the local administration, not to speak of any designs as regards territorial seizure.

I, therefore, again repeat that the reason for our visit is our anxiety aroused by the various rumors of impending danger to the Japanese residents, and the purpose of our visit is to obtain all information on the spot, and should any danger actually exist to take proper measures to protect and safeguard Japanese lives and interests.

Thus, whether we are to remain here for some time or whether we can curtail our visit depends entirely upon prevailing conditions. I trust, however, that our fears are groundless, and that we shall be able to leave shortly, with full confidence in the friendly attitude toward the Japanese nation on the part of your local population.

I take this opportunity of tendering you my best wishes.

The contents of this appeal are sufficient evidence that no danger actually threatened the Japanese from the Russian population. But there is something strange, to say the least, in the special "assurance" given to the population that there is no intention whatever "to interfere in the internal affairs of the local administration, not to speak of any designs of territorial seizure."

How far the Japanese in Nikolayevsk refrained from interfering in "the internal affairs" we have already seen above; their "designs," as far as territorial acquisitions are concerned, can be seen from what follows.

In the beginning of October the Japanese were forced to leave the destroyed city of Nikolayevsk for the winter; on October 1, as a farewell, the following appeal was addressed to the remaining population (the appeal signed by Maj. Gen. Tsuno):

In the spring of this year the city of Nikolayevsk was set on fire by the bolshevik barbarians, as a result of which the population is without homes or food, its destitution reaching the highest limits. It is hard for outsiders, who are guided by the principles of humanity and justice, to be mere lookers-on. Ever since coming here the Japanese troops have tried to preserve peace and order and endeavored to improve the welfare of the population. This attitude for the present as well as in the future remains unchanged. Realizing that it is impossible to leave troops for the winter in a destroyed city, we have decided to remove them from the Nikolayevsk region until the next spring. I call upon the local population by common efforts to preserve peace and order during the winter.

When the provisional Zemstvo government in Vladivostok tried to send boats with foodstuffs and medicines to Nikolayevsk, they had to overcome many obstacles that were put in their way by the Japanese. New demands were made every day, constant inquiries sent to Tokyo; and the population of Nikolayevsk suffered from hunger and cold while precious time was wasted for these negotiations.

Finally the Japanese "permitted" the provisional government to send two boats, Erivan and Vzryvatel, into the latter's own territorial waters, on the following conditions:

1. The boats are to be subject to directions of respective Japanese naval authorities as to their actions upon arrival and stay in port.

2. The purpose of the commission is limited to the investigation of events and to rendering aid to the victims.

3. Upon the completion of their task they must leave Nikolayevsk.

4. Safety in the channel or on land is not guaranteed. The Japanese military authorities, however, are willing to render all possible assistance.

5. Those arriving in port must have with them personal identifications issued by Japanese civil and military authorities in Japan as well as abroad.

6. The Japanese military authorities have no means of furnishing quarters or food supplies to those arriving.

7. The arrivals are requested not to engage in propaganda and not to break order and peace.

In this way part of the provisional Zemstvo government's own territory became for them a place "abroad."

Lists of persons going on the boats were handed to the Japanese, who issued the following certificate:

CERTIFICATE.

A medical and feeding unit is at present organized by the Russian Red Cross, and is going to Nikolayevsk on the SS. Erivan and Vzryvatel, which belong to the volunteer fleet, at the request of the Russo-Japanese Military Commission. While we agree in principle and have nothing against the work undertaken by the Red Cross in its sending men and supplies, we are at the same time very much afraid that it may have back of it intentions of a political nature. Although we have taken proper precautionary measures, we hope the Japanese authorities will exercise due vigilance at the time of actual arrival and place of debarkation.

(Signed) Gen. TAKAYANAGI and Col. ISOME.

The boats were unable to start out before July.

XXII.

True to their declaration, and hoping that the Japanese, upon their official invitation, would also leave the country, the Americans withdrew and evacuated their troops.

The withdrawal of the Americans made it necessary for the Japanese to explain themselves, and on March 31 they issued the following short but significant declaration of their Government:

The expedition of our forces to Siberia was undertaken with a view to assisting the Czecho-Slovak troops. Therefore, when the evacuation of the latter has been completed our forces shall be withdrawn. This was definitely stated at the time in our declaration. But no other country is in such proximity to Siberia as our empire. Unfortunately, the present political situation in the Far East, which not only threatens the safety and life of our citizens residing in Siberia, but is also a menace to the general peace in Korea and Manchuria, makes it impossible for us to withdraw our troops from the Russian Far East immediately. The Japanese Government, therefore, desires to corroborate its statement that the presence of the Japanese forces in the Russian Far East does not imply any political designs against Russia (italics in the original) and desires to declare that as soon as the political situation in the Russian Far East has become normal to the extent that there will be no danger for Korea and Manchuria, and life and property of our nationals protected and normal railway communication restored, that then, after the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak forces has been completed, our troops will be withdrawn from Siberia as early as possible. (Italics in the original.)

This document is curious in many respects: 1. For the first time emphasis is laid on the special interest that Japan has in the Russian Far East—geographic proximity. 2. Japan sets forth her own and not the interallied policy in Siberia; America's withdrawal, therefore, has no importance for the Japanese. 3. Here, again, as in the famous communique of August 13, 1918, the connection between Japanese intervention and the fate of Manchuria is emphasized—that part of Manchuria which is in the sphere of Russia's influence and which is crossed by the Chinese-Eastern Railway. 4. A new excuse for intervention is found in the danger to Korea's peace. 5. And even after all the conditions shall have been carried out they do not speak of an instant or even speedy withdrawal of troops, but of "as soon as possible."

Again the Japanese remained true to themselves. This declaration was only issued by Japan in order to divert the attention of the world from her true intentions. They continued their activity, which had already led to the sad events in Nikolayevsk, and the very existence of this activity testifies to its being conducted for the sole purpose of provoking similar occurrences to afford an unfailing excuse for carrying out the long-prepared plan of seizure of the entire, or, for the time being, of part of the Russian Far East. It was necessary to prove to the world that the situation in the Far East still required the presence of Japanese troops there.

Taking an extremely provocative attitude, with the intention of arousing the ire of the population, and at the same time apparently feeling somewhat uneasy at the sight of the growing power of the Russian Army, which, in the interests of the Japanese designs, had to be destroyed, the Japanese, on the night of April 4, suddenly advanced along the entire coast of the Maritime Province, carrying out a veritable massacre with the aid not only of rifles but also of cannon and machine guns. (In Vladivostok a few shots were actually fired from a battleship.) They made no distinction between men, women, and children. The building of the Provincial Zemstvo Board, the headquarters of the maritime government, was destroyed both from within and without and all records taken; on all Government buildings Japanese flags were hoisted. Thousands of people were arrested and thrown into cellars and concentration camps, where they were subjected to torture. The number of people who were shot or who disappeared without leaving any trace was enormous. The troops and the militia were disarmed. Especially there were many killed and wounded in Khabarovsk and Nikolsk. The losses sustained by the population and the Government during these raids are almost incalculable—there were destroyed, burned, and pillaged many millions of gold rubles' worth of private, Government, and military property. The post and telegraph buildings as well as gunboats were seized, and everything of value on board was stolen. It was a regular practice of the Japanese and the heads of the White Guards living at the Japanese General Staff to free from the prisons all counter-revolutionaries, who immediately upon their liberation took to their destructive work. There is no doubt that the failure on the part of the few reactionaries to establish their, or rather the Japanese authority, was due primarily to the fact that the officials of the Provincial Zemstvo Board remained alive and self-possessed, and also to the fact that the feeling of hatred which filled the Russian population—excepting the handful of traitors who lived on the means of the Japanese General Staff—was quite manifest, and finally to the active support given by the Czechs and others.

The population of the Far East can not to this day forget the sad fate of one of the members of the military council, Lazo, who ordered the troops not to resist the Japanese. Lazo, together with Sibirtsev, Lutsky, and others was seized by the Japanese and spirited away. Most of those arrested by the Japanese were freed, but Lazo, Sibirtsev, and Lutsky never showed up. All inquiries made by the authorities and relatives of the arrested regarding their fate were answered by the Japanese with claims of ignorance. Only subsequently was it learned that those arrested had been handed over by the Japanese to the white guards, who burned them in their locomotive engine.

The maritime government, which had barely found refuge under the Czech general staff, issued a protest to all representatives of the allied powers at Vladivostok.

At a special conference of all allied representatives, the Japanese hastened to declare that their advance should not be interpreted as an "occupation" but only as a "self-defense"; that the Japanese flags that were flying over the Government buildings were only in conformity with the military custom requiring the hoisting of flags over buildings taken in battle; that they had to take these buildings "in battle," as if the Japanese had been fired at from those buildings.

The maritime government, one member of which had been arrested by the Japanese and then freed, again convened in the building of the Provincial Zemstvo Board, and the Japanese flags were removed.

These events were particularly unexpected in view of the negotiations which were in progress on the afternoon of April 4, between the Japanese and the maritime government, concerning a series of demands submitted on behalf of the Japanese Government by Gen. Takayanagi. These demands were submitted in the following statement:

With regard to the declaration made by our Imperial Government concerning the presence of our troops in Siberia, the commander of the Japanese forces in Siberia authorizes me to conduct negotiations with the representatives of the military authorities of the provisional government of the Maritime Province with a view to establishing friendly relations and avoiding conflicts which may, judging by the facts of the past and present, arise between our forces on the one hand and the Russian authorities and the local population on the other hand, regarding the presence of our troops in the Maritime Province.

In order to enter into negotiations I on my part have the honor to state to you the terms to be submitted the provisional government, and to beg your reply.

These terms are as follows:

1. To take care of our troops, providing them with quarters, food, means of transportation, mail privileges, etc.

2. To obey all the regulations contained in the agreement concluded between our Government or our command on the one hand and the Russian authorities on the other hand, on the basis of the agreement concluded between the allied powers or the allied commands, no matter when these regulations were instituted.

3. Not to arrest without our knowledge or restrict the liberty of persons who actively aided our military operations.

4. To cease all the activities of secret organizations and groups menacing the safety of our troops and the public peace in Korea and Manchuria.

5. Not to publish articles and provocative attacks against our troops and our Government.

6. To exert all efforts in order to insure the safety of life, property, and other rights of our subjects in this region, including the Koreans.

(Signed) GEN. TAKAYANAGI.

In spite of the fact that the character of these demands was an insult to the Russian Government, as they were practically reducing to nothing the rights of the Russian people, the Government of the Maritime Province agreed to consider these demands, and created for this purpose a Russo-Japanese adjustment commission, and appointed its representatives. The chairman on the Russian side was Zeitlin, subsequently killed by Merkulov's henchmen in Vladivostok.

This commission was to meet with the Japanese on the following day, and at night the Japanese launched an attack upon the entire Maritime Province. On the morning of April 5 the following proclamation, signed by the commander of the Japanese forces in Siberia, Gen. Oi, was posted on the streets of Vladivostok:

Citizens, on the basis of the declaration made by the Japanese Government on March 31 of this year, the Japanese command has been conducting negotiations since April 2 with the representatives of the Russian authorities regarding the peaceful solution of the question of the presence of the Japanese forces in the Province. Suddenly, on the night of April 4–5, Russian armed groups attacked our munition stores, garages, and transfer stations, and also fired, in several places, at our outposts. In view of these illegal acts, and in order to avoid the danger which is threatening from armed Russian detachments, the Japanese command is compelled to demand the disarming of these detachments. In this case, the Japanese command, not pursuing any aims of its own, can not allow further disorders, and will therefore take measures after negotiations with the Russian authorities.

The provisional government sent notes of protest to the Japanese Government and to the Inter-Allied diplomatic conference, categorically denying the statement made by Gen. Oi and demanding the restoration of the normal status of the Province.

Even if we were to admit that the Russian people, or "armed groups," as the Japanese called them, attacked the Japanese in Vladivostok, then how can the simultaneous Japanese advance over the entire territory of the Maritime Province be explained?

That these raids were carefully planned and premeditated can be seen from the following copy of a document which was prepared by the Japanese previous to their advance and submitted to the Russian commanding officer of the Ugolnaya station on the night of April 5:

Demand, (April——).

TO THE COMMANDING OFFICER OF THE REVOLUTIONARY TROOPS OF THE UGOLNAYA GARRISON: At the command of the Japanese commanding officer, I submit to you the following demands:

1. I shall not permit the presence of your armed militia within the limits of the Japanese Army's operations, since the negotiations between Japan and Russia have remained without result.

2. You should order the disarming of your soldiers, and you should turn over to us, temporarily, all weapons and military equipments.

3. Should your troops refuse our demand or attempt to flee, I will most decidedly pursue them with all the military power at my disposal. On the other hand, if your troops will obey our demand and disarm, I will not harm any one; in fact, I will even offer protection to them in our Army. Further, I beg you to reply to this letter in half an hour's time after its receipt.

(Signed) COMMANDER OF THE JAPANESE GARRISON ON THE UGOLNAYA STATION.

XXIII.

The diplomatic representative of Japan in Siberia, Mr. Matsudaira, desiring apparently to soften somewhat the impression created by the Japanese attack, declared in an interview that the Japanese were acting in accordance with an agreement with all the Allies. The Russian press naturally was much disturbed, and as a result the American consul made public, on May 12, the following telegram of the American Government:

In connection with the comments on the interview with Matsudaira regarding the question of the policy of Japan in Siberia, which appeared in the press a few days ago, it is desirable to give publicity to the fact that no agreement was made nor discussion thereof regarding the zone of the Chinese Far Eastern Railroad was entered into on the part of the United States since the Inter-Allied agreement concluded in 1919, in accordance with which the Inter-Allied railroad commission and the Inter-Allied technical board were formed, and allied military aid for the protection of Russian roads was granted.

The Japanese, seeing the results of their attack as expressed in the indignation of the Russian population, which was too manifest to escape the eyes of the foreigners, and which naturally compromised them, could do nothing else but print "denials."

Particularly characteristic is the letter from the General Staff of the Japanese gendarmerie in Vladivostok of May 7.

addressed to the regional inspector of the militia of Vladivostok, and signed by Maj. Gen. Yosihara:

IN REPLY TO A NEWSPAPER ARTICLE.

On April 5 of this year the following article appeared in Krasnoye Znamya: "During the attack of the Japanese Army in the city of Khabarovsk innocent citizens were massacred, among them women and children, who were even thrown into the fire," etc.

This is a lie. There are people who know the dignity of the Japanese troops, who respect honesty and justice, and do not believe this brazen lie. But among the ignorant population the statements given in this article have found believers. Therefore we can not remain silent, as such articles only disturb the friendly relations which are being resumed between Russia and Japan. For this reason we desire that an order be issued as soon as possible for the repudiation of this article and that steps be taken to preclude the appearance of such untruthful articles in the future.

Thus, in the opinion of the Japanese militarists, it is not the cruel acts that provoke animosity on the part of the Russian population, but the "description" of these acts by the newspapers. * * *

Most characteristic for the Japanese behavior in the Far East is the following fact, which is worthy of note: While shooting was going on in the city of Nikosk, Japanese soldiers distributed and scattered proclamations, in bad Russian, of the following text:

First. Fellow citizens, do not be disturbed. Continue at your work; now the Japanese Army has entered into negotiations with the revolutionary government and its army in order to maintain peace in the Far East and to preserve the life and the property belonging to the Russian Government.

Citizens must not provoke any catastrophic disorders. Robbery, murder, and disorder are illegal acts which are absolutely forbidden by the Japanese Army. The Japanese Army is taking all possible steps to guarantee the preservation of life and property. The commander of the Army repeats: Citizens, do not be disturbed, and meet with full confidence the Japanese Army; it is desirable that you should continue your regular work.

(Signed) MAJ. GEN. ODAGARI,
Commander of the Japanese Army in the City of Nikolsk-Usurisk.

Second. Having sincerely at heart the welfare of the Russian Far East, the Japanese Army declares that the measures it has taken for the disarming of the revolutionary forces are in no way calculated to destroy your army. Upon the conclusion of peace you may again organize new powerful armies. The inhabitants of the city of Nikolsk-Usurisk may rest assured that the peace and order which they are enjoying are due to the mutual political cooperation existing between our officials.

(Signed) MAJ. GEN. ODAGARI,
Commander of the Japanese Forces in the City of Nikolsk-Usurisk.

When the first two proclamations did not help, a third one, in not less colorful language, was issued.

Third. Citizens of the city of Nikolsk-Usurisk, do not be disturbed, and continue at your regular work. All stores, market places, theaters, and commercial establishments must be kept going. The Japanese Army conducts war only against the dangerous elements, but with peaceful citizens it desires to live in amity. Life, property, and the inviolability of person is guaranteed to all citizens; the treatment of captured prisoners will be most magnanimous, and their families may rest assured about their fate.

(Signed) MAJ. GEN. ODAGARI,
Commander of the Japdnese Forces in the City of Nikolsk-Usurisk.

XXIV.

After long negotiations and under pressure on the part of the Japanese, while armed clashes were going on in the region, the Japanese forced the acceptance of their project of an agreement of April 4, which was accepted almost entirely. The provisional government succeeded in inserting insignificant corrections only. And on the basis of this agreement, referred to as the agreement of April 5, there was concluded a new agreement on April 29 of the same year, according to which, in the territory occupied by the Japanese troops, the Russians were not allowed to station their troops within a zone of 30 kilometers on either side of the railroad. The railroad, of course, was seized by the Japanese.

XXV.

In the meantime an energetic activity was going on in the whole far eastern territory that was separated from Russia and torn asunder internally by the impenetrable wall erected by the Japanese and Semenov in Transbaikalia; an activity the aim of which was to unite the entire territory of the Russian Far East and to overcome all Japanese efforts, intrigues, and bloody repressions, the only purpose of which was to keep the Russian Far East in a state of disunion, civil war, and anarchy. On April 6, 1920, there assembled in Verkhne-Udinsk, the center of the Zemstvo government of Pribaikalia, the conference of the working population of Pribaikalia, which proclaimed the independence of the Far East and the formation of a democratic republic of the Far East.

The declaration was communicated to the Government of soviet Russia and to the Governments of all allied countries.

The declaration of April 6 was to become the starting point in the difficult work of the real union of all the regions and of the fusion of all regional governments.

But this appeal of the conference of the toiling population, as well as the appeal of the newly elected government to all allied countries, was answered only by the government of soviet Russia. On May 14, Chicherin, commissar of foreign affairs, communicated that the independence of the Far Eastern democratic republic was recognized by the government of the Russian soviet republic.

XXVI.

Almost simultaneously with the answer of soviet Russia, or rather three days before, on May 11, apparently as an answer to the declaration of independence of the Far East, was published the declaration of Gen. Oi, the commander in chief of the Japanese expeditionary forces, which has since become famous in the Far East; the publication of this declaration was explained as an answer to the proposals of the representative of the soviet government to arrange some agreement between the partisan troops and the Red Army on one hand and the Japanese on the other.

The declaration begins with the statement that Japan "has no designs and attempts no encroachments on Russian territorial rights" and explains further the "incident" April 4 and 5 in the Maritime Province as a "necessary act of self-defense" against the "attacks on the part of partisan detachments," "for the purpose of defense," and points out that "Japan can not shut her eyes to the fact that in a territory bordering on Japan political groups are formed which intend to trample under foot the laws of mankind and to violate the peace of the whole world." In this declaration it is said:

Now that the transport of the Czecho-Slovak troops is nearing its end, I declare frankly that the Japanese military command will gladly withdraw its troops as soon as the situation of the Russian possessions in the Far East is firmly established, as soon as any possibility of a menace to Korea and Manchuria is eliminated and the safety of life and property of the Japanese population in the country is assured.

The Japanese command, taking into consideration the will of the Russian population, does not intend to complicate the political situation of the territory by giving its support to individual Russians, without regard to the will of the Russian people.

The Japanese command, together with the Russian population, heartily welcomes the formation of an autonomous territory composed of the regions of the Far East, and the institution of such a political system of government as will correspond to the will of the entire population.

Subsequently it is pointed out that "for the attainment of the situation explained above, it is first of all necessary that the Russian troops should stop military activities against the Japanese troops in Chita, and that in that region there should be arranged between the Japanese troops and the eastward-moving bolsheviks a zone which should be exempt from the intrusion of troops of both sides, whereupon it will be possible to put into effect the union of the Provinces on the basis of self-government."

The declaration ends with a peculiar Japanese "but":

The bestialities of the Russian troops which occurred not so long ago in Nikolayevsk on the Amur, evoke in my heart a sentiment of deep grief. The Russian troops, taking advantage of the small number of our troops, surrounded and destroyed them; moreover, they also killed the imperial consul and brutally exterminated many peaceful Japanese citizens. This offense, which is beyond description, made a deep impression on the Japanese people, wherefore it is self-evident that this question requires a separate settlement.

This declaration is extraordinarily interesting in many respects: 1. While welcoming, "together with the Russian population," the formation of an independent Far Eastern State (the declaration of independence of April 6), at the same time it makes the withdrawal of the Japanese troops conditional, as it were, upon the realization of this aim—"as soon as the situation of the Russian possessions in the Far East will be firmly established." 2. While giving their support to Semenov for the purpose of destroying the work of unity, or in case this should not succeed, in order to bring about a protectorate over the republic, the declaration endeavors to divert the attention of the population and of foreigners by the statement that they do not wish to complicate the political situation by giving support to "individual Russians." 3. While they apparently were considering the imminent necessity of evacuating Transbaikalia, where Semenov held power owing to the support of Japanese bayonets and where the troops of the Verkhne-Udinsk government were fighting him, they intended to help him and therefore put forth the question concerning "the cessation by the Russian troops of military activities against the Japanese troops in Chita." 4. No mention is made here of the fact that the intervention was a common undertaking of all the Allies; on the contrary, the question of the intervention here resolves itself to one of Japanese "interests." 5. Here may already be seen a limitation of the Japanese appetites as far as territorial conquests or spheres of influence are concerned (why will be explained later), and hence the unwillingness to clash with the red army. 6. And finally, the first open statement as to the necessity of a "separate settlement" of the Nikolayevsk incident.

XXVII.

The declaration of Gen. Oi, of May 14, was answered by the minister of foreign affairs in Verkhne-Udinsk, whose reply contained the following statements:

By an agreement with soviet Russia, our Government, on the very day of the occupation of Verkhne-Udinsk by our troops, arranged for a neutral zone, which is requested in the declaration. The red soviet army stopped its advance west of the Selenga River. Our people's revolutionary army is concerned with the definite task of breaking up the last remainders of reaction which stand between our people and the long-expected peace. Our Government and our command have taken all the necessary steps for avoiding clashes with the Japanese vanguard. Your command was informed about this in a great number of telegrams and communications. I am empowered to announce that in order to speed the satisfactory solution of this question our Government is ready to discontinue military activities against our internal enemies, on the condition, however, that the Japanese troops will exert pressure on the reactionary bands, forcing them to lay down their arms and to cease any armed attacks against the people's revolutionary army.

It is quite superfluous to insist upon the fact that our Government, whose aim is peace and unity, warmly and gladly welcomes the proposal of the Japanese command, and is ready to meet its representatives at an arranged time and place for a final and speedy settlement of all problems.

On May 31 the Verkhne-Udinsk government published a new address to all allied countries in which was announced the creation of the Far Eastern Republic, and their attention was called to the necessity of a real unity of all the various regions and to the conditions the fulfillment of which is necessary for the final establishment of peace and order in the Russian Far East. These conditions were as follows:

1. That the red army of the All-Russian Soviet Government should cease its eastward advance at a certain established point (at that time this condition was already fulfilled).

2. That the foreign Governments, especially the expeditionary forces of Japan, should not give any help or support to the remainders of the reactionary forces that are concentrated in Chita.

3. That the road to Chita should be open, so that it may be possible to unite the Province of Transbaikalia with the other far eastern Provinces.

4. That friendly economic relations should be immediately established between our republic and the allied countries, for their mutual welfare, and for relieving the present difficulties and hardships.

5. That all the foreign expeditionary troops should leave the country, thus affording a possibility for commercial and industrial pursuits.

It is necessary to point out here that the activity aiming at the creation of the far eastern democratic republic was going on at the same time in the Maritime, the Amur, and the Pribaikal Provinces, and that all the local governments were persistently endeavoring to obtain a possibility of entering into immediate relations with each other for the purpose of a real fusion of the various administrations. But Semenov's "cork" in Chita, which was especially created by the Japanese and actively protected by them at the time of Kolchak's rule, with the purpose of weakening his power, was now specifically destined to prevent the possibility of relations between the local governments.

Soon after the conference of the toiling people had elected the government of Verkhne-Udinsk, it was recognized by the government of the Amur Province as the central government for the entire Far East (on May 25).

Afraid that the maritime government, which had been recognized as the provisional government by Sakhalin, might also extend its recognition to the government of Verkhne-Udinsk as a central government, the Japanese began to exert on it an incessant pressure, not even stopping at threats and reminding them of the events of April 4–5. At the same time the Japanese also began to coquet with the maritime government, declaring it to be the only truly democratic government, and that Japan would recognize it if it would place itself at the head of all the provincial governments.

The situation for the Russian population was clear: The Verkhne-Udinsk government was outside of the zone of activity of the Japanese troops, and for this reason it was the most independent; but for this very same reason it was unacceptable for the Japanese; the maritime government was under the continuous pressure of the Japanese and under the steady menace of being overthrown by the Russian counter-revolutionists who were all the time kept in readiness in the Japanese General Staff—and for this reason it was more acceptable for the Japanese (further developments, as was to be expected, showed that even this was nothing more than a part of the Japanese game).

Thus the Japanese brought up and inflated the question of the "priority" of the governments, i. e., which government was to be the central government, and every possible measure was taken to prevent the meeting of the representatives of the maritime and the Verkhne-Udinsk governments. And all the time the Japanese posed officially as the "advisers" and "mediators" between the governments.

In Gen. Oi's answer of June 26 to the note of the Verkhne-Udinsk government of May 31, this motive was even emphasized; instead of giving a direct answer to the question asked, the Japanese declared to the Verkhne-Udinsk government that although it was recognized by the soviet government, nevertheless it could not be considered as a stable and legitimate government of the entire Russian Far East. The recognition of the Verkhne-Udinsk administration as the central government extended to it by the authorities of the Amur Province was not convincing either, because the government of the Amur Province itself could not be considered as a stable government. The Verkhne-Udinsk government could be considered by the Japanese only as a local government and only in this capacity were they willing to start negotiations with it for the cessation of military activities. Further on, Gen. Oi disclosed his real intentions with regard to Ataman Semenov: "I can not consider Semenov's government as a brigand lair of a band of mutinous troops; I recognize it also as one of the governments existing in the Russian Far East." The Japanese wish to give, "under peaceful conditions, to the Russian population and to every government that is the true representative of the population of every Province, the possibility of forming, on the Russian territory of the Far East, a buffer zone that is desirable to them. Therefore, in considering the question of the buffer zone on the Russian territory of the Far East, I can not ignore the government of Semenov."

Thus, in addition to preventing the population from expelling Semenov, the Japanese declared his organization to be a government with equal rights ("which is the true representative of the population" of its territory) and which would have to take part in the deliberations concerning the creation of a central government of the Far East.

Further on, touching upon the question of ceasing the struggle, Gen. Oi states: "Moreover, as mentioned above, in recognizing the government of Semenov, and with the intention of preventing disturbances in a region that has close relations with our country, I am collaborating with Semenov's troops for the purpose of upholding order in Transbaikalia. Therefore, simultaneously with the cessation of military activities between the troops of Semenov and the Verkhne-Udinsk government, I desire also to bring about the cessation of military activities between the Japanese troops and the Verkhne-Udinsk government."

Thus it is rather a hard thing to separate Semenov from Japan and Japan from Semenov. They are both parts of an integral whole.

XXVIII.

While the negotiations for an armistice with the Verkhne-Udinsk government were going on, and the Japanese were playing with the maritime government, not allowing it to recognize the Verkhne-Udinsk government, their staff located in Sakhalyan (on Chinese territory, opposite Blagovyeshchensk, on the other bank of the Amur River) was continuously threatening the Amur government in order to induce it to break away from Verkhne-Udinsk and join the maritime administration, recognizing the latter as the central government. In spite of all these threats the Amur government persisted in its old attitude and declared, as had the Verkhne-Udinsk government, that it considered Semenov's men not as a government, but as bandits subject to the criminal courts of the Republic.

A similar point of view was taken by the maritime government, but the Japanese (this time the representatives of the diplomatic mission) declared to it that they could not abandon Semenov at one stroke after they had supported him for such a long time; that it was necessary to give them the possibility to "save their face"; that if Semenov would not agree to the demands of the maritime government, if he would not listen to their advice, they would have a legitimate reason to turn their backs upon him.

The maritime government agreed to receive a delegation from Semenov, and on its arrival proposed to it, in the interest of a peaceful solution of the question, at once to create a provisional parliament in Chita, a national assembly after the maritime model, and to surrender to it all civil and military power. Semenov's men did not agree to this, of course, as they knew very well that the population would not allow them to continue their rule, and thus all negotiations were discontinued, although Semenov's adherents endeavored to prolong them, trying at the same time to prepare a counter-revolutionary coup in Vladivostok.

XXIX.

While the Japanese were conducting this complicated game, continuously diverting the attention of the Russian population and its authorities, they were at the same time preparing a new attack on the Amur Province.

In the secret correspondence between the ministry of war in Tokyo and Gen. Oi, as well as the Japanese general staff in Vladivostok and the commander of the Fourteenth Division in Khabarovsk, which was made public in the Far East to the great horror of the Japanese, all the details of the Japanese adventure that was prepared at that time are uncovered. It is necessary to add that the Japanese denied the authenticity of this correspondence, calling it "propaganda"—but what else could the Japanese say when their plans are uncovered?

We reproduce here the full text of two interesting and highly important telegrams:

WAR MINISTRY, TOKYO, June 12, 1920.

(Secret Order No. S1233–11.)

To the COMMANDER OF THE SIBERIAN ARMY, Vladivostok:

After the events in Nikolayevsk on the Amur, the Japanese Imperial Government considers itself compelled to issue the following orders, which may defend the Japanese interests in the Maritime and Amur Provinces.

We order you to prepare a plan of military operations which must serve our interests in case of occupation of the territory along the Amur. In preparing your plan you must use the following clauses as a basis:

We recommend that the above-mentioned territory be divided into three military divisions; as the present political situation does not permit us as yet to send a large army for your disposal, we expect from your military experience and shrewdness that you will prepare the requested plan in such a manner that it will receive the approval of His Imperial Majesty. In order to aid you in your work, we will send you as soon as possible all the plans which have already been worked out in the foreign ministry and which provide for the necessary organization of civil institutions in case of occupation. You must immediately create a commission of officers of the general staff and commissariat, and send this commission to the above-mentioned territory, so that the commission may make valuable military and economic reports to you. Our interests also demand preparation of an offensive against Blagovyeshchensk, the outlying districts of which are full of regular and irregular partisan and bolshevist troops.

According to the reports of our agents who are in this territory engaged in investigating this problem, the offensive is as yet premature. In any event you must have everything in readiness for an offensive, so that it could be started at a moment's notice. The general interests of the Japanese Imperial Government demand that the occupation be carried out completely in the immediate future; therefore we order you to submit a plan of occupation within the shortest possible period.

Immediately after receiving this telegram, Gen. Oi addressed the following demand to the commander of the Fourteenth Division in Khabarovsk:

VLADIVOSTOK, Chief Staff.

(Secret Order No. S–B242, June 17, 1920.)

To the COMMANDER OF THE FOURTEENTH DIVISION:

I am transmitting herewith the inclosed order, and I order you to immediately create a commission which will gather the necessary information in the territory between Khabarovsk and Nikolayevsk, and which must submit the same to you within the shortest possible time.

Reply immediately by telegraph how many days would be required for the Fourteenth Division to be ready for an offensive against Blagovyeshchensk. Do you consider the forces at your disposal sufficient for your operation? If you consider your present forces insufficient, report immediately, so that I can dispose of the units which are expected from Chita.

I call your attention to the bridge across the Amur, as in case of an offensive our army may need the bridge. The preparation and repair of this bridge must begin immediately. If necessary occupy the local arsenal for this purpose.

According to your previous reports, I expect that those Russians whom you mentioned will be very useful to us in case of occupation. In my opinion we will have a complete administration in the entire Maritime Province; therefore I order you to discuss your plans with reliable Russians. The names of the Russians who are ready to serve His Japanese Imperial Majesty are to be forwarded to me at once.

(Signed) OI.

Thus after June 12, when instructions were given in Tokyo regarding the preparation of an attack on the Amur Province, all Japanese activities, as far as the various negotiations were concerned, were undertaken with the sole purpose of diverting the attention of the Russian authorities from their real plans and intentions.

The evacuation of Transbaikalia was prepared only in order to mask the seizure of the Sakhalin region.

XXX.

In order to make the subsequent events more clear it is necessary to go back a little: After the conclusion of the armistice and the signing of the agreement of April 29, it was necessary, for the fulfillment of this agreement, to put a stop to the struggle which went on after the Japanese attack of April 4 and 5 between the Khabarovsk garrison and the Amur population, on the one hand, and the Japanese on the other hand. For this purpose the Russian authorities sent their representatives, such as Utkin and others. The truce was concluded and the Russian troops, in accordance with the agreement of April 29, were withdrawn beyond the Amur. After that the Japanese delivered the city of Khabarovsk to the so-called Bochkarev men, a band organized after the Semenov model, and the settlements which remained without troops and militia were delivered to the tender mercies of the Khunkhuses (Chinese bandits), who were also supported by the Japanese. The excesses of these bands lasted for a long time. The attempts of the Government to send militia to disarm them were opposed by the Japanese. The persons who were arrested at the time of the April occurrences, numbering about 150, were, in spite of the agreement, not liberated. But finally the excesses of the Bochkarev men became so scandalous that the Japanese could not, without altogether compromising themselves, prevent the Government from disbanding them.

After negotiations in Khabarovsk the Vladivostok militia was admitted, which, after a short firing, arrested the Bochkarev men, who had taken their quarters in one of the big hotels. But even here, on the insistence of the Japanese, the militia was forced to liberate the Japanese agent, Panov, who had been arrested.

The Japanese declared to Mr. Utkin, who was sent by the Vladivostok government to Khabarovsk, that the only way to bring about peace was to sign a special agreement. This agreement contained clauses such as these:

Clause 2. Nobody has the right to conceal or to keep weapons and cartridges without the consent of the Japanese command (excluding hunting rifles, revolvers, and the cartridges needed for them).

Clause 3. The authorities must inform the Japanese command of the arrival and departure of steamers.

Clause 4. The administration has not the right to arrest any persons because of their previous activities, regardless of their political affiliation, and must guarantee the inviolability of their lives.

Clause 5. The administration must not allow the holding of meetings in the open without giving notice to the Japanese command 24 hours before announcing them.

Clause 6. The Japanese command has the right, if it considers it necessary, to ask the Russian postal and telegraph authorities, who must give their consent thereto, to submit mail and telegrams to be censored by representatives of the Japanese command.

It is not astonishing that the Japanese did not particularly insist when the maritime government—although in this era of intervention it was accustomed to a good many things—refused to confirm the agreement.

Mr. Utkin, who was traveling in the train of the commander of the Fourteenth Division under the protection of Japanese soldiers, and, moreover, in the same car that was occupied by the commander, was killed on his return trip to Vladivostok at the station of Iman by two Russian White Guards who were in the service of the Japanese—Japanese agents.

How farsighted the Japanese were, and how much they are acting according to a definite plan, may be seen from the agreement of April 29, which they forced the maritime government to accept. According to this agreement the Russian troops which were leaving the region where the Japanese troops were stationed (the 30-kilometer zone) could be sent neither to the Sakhalin district, which they soon occupied, nor to Transbaikalia, which they soon evacuated, and where Semenov remained. Thus, even before giving their instructions concerning the preparation of the attack against the Amur region, the Japanese did not allow Khabarovsk to recover its normal condition. From here news of disorders was incessantly emanating, and these disorders were to serve as a justification for the Japanese activities.

XXXI.

On July 3, 1920, the following declaration of the Japanese Government was published:

In the period from March 12 to the month of May of the current year, in Nikolayevsk on the Amur, the local bolsheviks in the most atrocious manner killed the Japanese defense detachment, the employees of the consulate, as well as Japanese residents, altogether about 700 persons, of both sexes and of various ages. This occurrence exceeds anything in its atrocity and brutality. In order to safeguard the dignity of the country, the Imperial Japanese Government is compelled to take the necessary measures. At the present time, however, there is practically no government with which it could communicate on this subject, and for this reason the Japanese Imperial Government is quite unable to do anything in this matter.

In view of the aforesaid, and until a lawful government be organized and the question favorably settled, those places in the Sakhalin district which are considered as requiring occupation will be occupied.

With regard to Transbaikalia, the Government, taking into consideration that at the present time the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak troops from this region has already been completed, and relying on a declaration which the Imperial Government has already made repeatedly—has decided in this case to evacuate its troops from the indicated region. In Vladivostok, however, as well as in its surroundings, there exists not only a menace to Korea, and an inclination to take an unfriendly attitude, but there are also living in these districts numerous Japanese subjects.

The city of Khabarovsk is an important point on the way to the Sakhalin district. Consequently the troops must needs remain there in adequate number until the time when stable and peaceful conditions will be reestablished in the above-mentioned localities.

Here the question as to a "special settlement" of the events of Nikolayevsk is cleared up—by the occupation of the district of Sakhalin. This occupation is mitigated by the fact of the evacuation of Transbaikalia. But the full meaning of this evacuation already became clear from the secret telegram of June 17.

XXXII.

Frightened by the Japanese evacuation, Ataman Semenov, on July 11, applies to the heir of the Japanese throne, as to the "stalwart defender of the ideas of humanity, the most worthy of the noble Japanese knights," "the expression of the pure ideals of the Japanese Nation"—with the entreaty "to insist * * * before his mighty parent, His Imperial Majesty, on the cessation of the evacuation of the troops from Transbaikalia, at least for four months," in order to help "the much-suffering Russian Army, struggling to hold Chita as the political center of the Far East, the aim of which is the establishment of peace and the undisturbed development of Russian life in the eastern borderland which is ruled by me—i. e., Semenov—with the consent of its noble neighbor, Japan."

To this petition of Semenov an answer was sent from Tokio through the commander of the Siberian troops, which was delivered to Semenov on August 11, at the Station Olovyannya. The contents of the answer, as it appears in the secret Japanese documents published in the Far East, are not altogether flattering for Semenov:

A REPLY TO SEMENOV.

TOKIO, War Ministry, 1920, 3/A.

To the COMMANDER OF THE SIBERIAN FORCES:

The Japanese Imperial Government has considered your desire from every angle. The Imperial Japanese Government is grateful to you and wishes to maintain friendly relations, but the situation pressing upon us from all sides does not permit us to grant your request. The Imperial Japanese Government does not consider you sufficiently strong to carry out the great object which would assure a great future to the Japanese people. Your influence with the Russian people is growing weaker daily, and the hatred which the people have against you does not aid us in our policies.

The Imperial Japanese Government sounded the question with the Allied Governments, but on all sides we found a negative attitude.

If you wish to direct your activities in another direction we will support them with great pleasure, but in accordance with the principles which are known to you.

Our reply to your economic questions will be transmitted within the next few days; in this matter we may reassure you.

NOTE.—This reply was transmitted to Semenov on August 11 at Station Olovyannaya.

XXXIII.

Although the Japanese made a declaration concerning the evacuation of Transbaikalia, they nevertheless insisted upon the signature of an agreement concerning the cessation of military activities by the Verkhne-Udinsk government; the Japanese wanted to secure the position of Semenov after their evacuation.

In this agreement lines were established which were not to be violated by both parties. Clause 5 especially provides that the "term of expiration of the present agreement is considered to be the termination of the work of the conference of representatives, who lawfully express the will of the population of the Russian Far East." By the "conference of representatives" is understood here the conference of the representatives of all regions of the Far East, which was constantly supposed to convene for sessions, but which up to that time had not assembled owing to obstacles put in its way by the Japanese.

The agreement is provided with a special and quite interesting note: "The troops under the command of Semenov recognize the present agreement, as is guaranteed by the representatives of the Japanese Expeditionary Army on the territory of the Far East."

The agreement was signed at the Station Gongota on July 15 by the Japanese and Russian representatives. On July 16 both parties signed a still more interesting document. It does not refer any more to the armistice, but to the future policy. (See Appendix No. 16.)

An interesting feature of the Japanese policy in the Far East which deserves attention is that it proclaims its adherence to aspirations that are really those of the Russian population, for which the latter really is struggling, and which it can not put into effect owing to the unfriendly policy of Japan. Such ideas are, in the present case:

1. The convocation of a conference of the representatives of all regions to bring about a real unification of the regions.

2. The creation of an independent far eastern republic.

Although for years they have obstructed the unification of the Far East, the Japanese, at the same time, in order to deceive the world abroad, incessantly and loudly assert that they are in favor of this unity.

It is necessary to mention right here that the first meeting in Verkhne-Udinsk of the representatives of the various regions did not take place until September.

XXXIV.

But let us return to the secret documents. The communication of Gen. Oi to the commander of the Fourteenth Division in Khabarovsk, dated July 12, reads as follows:

VLADIVOSTOK, July 12, 1920.

To the COMMANDER OF THE FOURTEENTH DIVISION, Khabarovsk:

According to information, the local government has no force whatsoever at its disposal. The Communist Party is daily growing stronger; but this does not interfere with our plans, as the forces at their disposal are not sufficiently strong. Our people, who are compelled to work together with the local government, are ready to assume authority at any moment and to maintain the administration until the occupation is completed.

Use all possible influence always to interfere with the work of the Khabarovsk administration, so that the representative of the government can not accomplish anything in his work. Help as much as possible the city party, but in such manner that the population may not notice it.

The negotiations with Semenov will soon end. Semenov's wishes are easily satisfied, and we are only awaiting the sanction of His Imperial Majesty and the Government.

I have been informed by the war minister that the general European situation makes it necessary for us not to carry out any of our plans during this month. The war minister ordered me to exercise extreme caution, and I order you to act likewise. Lately I have not been receiving from you any information as to what is going on in your district. Are our agents ready in the entire Province? I order you to reply to me immediately.

OI.

Thus, playing with the maritime government all this time, the Japanese were simultaneously retaining "Russians" in the service of the same government, so as to be able at any moment to overthrow it and to occupy this Province.

The instructions referring to Khabarovsk were strictly carried out.

In Khabarovsk, soon after a stop was put to the excesses of the Bochkarev men, there began, with the open support of the Japanese, the movement of a group of men headed by Likhoidov, members of the old city council from the days of Kolchak, which, defying the Vladivostok Government, did not want to arrange for new elections. The Government, which insisted upon new elections to the city council on the basis of universal suffrage (the law passed under Kerensky), attempted to take vigorous steps against disobedient citizens, and instructed the district emissary, Mileyev, as well as the militia, to put into effect the decisions of the Government. But here the Japanese stepped in, forbidding the militia to move freely in the city and extending their protection to Likhoidov and his band of reactionaries, who were carrying out the plans of the Japanese. Likhoidov declared that he was not subject to the authority of the maritime government, and it is he whom the Japanese refer to ("city party") in their secret telegrams.

On August 2 Gen. Oi sent decisive secret instructions to Khabarovsk:

VLADIVOSTOK, August 2, 1920.

To the COMMANDER OF THE FOURTEENTH DIVISION:

The offensive against the Amur Province must take place not later than the end of August. Your plans for the distribution of troops are approved. The left wing, which is distributed along the Usuri River, must be reinforced by one unit of sappers. The offensive must begin either from Usuri or Sungari. You must try to have the troops attack simultaneously. According to information in our possession, the enemy's positions are strongly fortified, but the right wing, which is close to the Amur, is the weakest, so that your attack from that side could be successful and decisive.

Your desire that your operations should be supported from Sakhalyan (a place in Manchuria) can not be carried out, because the political obligations to China do not allow it. We have taken certain steps in that direction, but without results.

It is evident that negotiations with the Semenov forces will not bring any results; these troops are also beginning to be poisoned with the Bolshevik virus. By order of the war minister, our aim must be as follows: Irregular and bolshevist troops must be driven out from the Provinces which are to be occupied. If our attack should be made with lightning speed we shall have the benefit of routing these troops in one month, and they will scatter in the direction of Chita. You must exert all efforts that during the offensive the commissars and the prominent Bolsheviks may fall into our hands, so that we can finish once for all with the danger which threatens us from the communists. Report immediately if there is anything that you need for the offensive, so that I may immediately execute.

(Signed) OI.

Likhoidov went to Vladivostok to negotiate with the Japanese, and as a result Gen. Oi reports to Khabarovsk:

From Vladivostok to Khabarovsk.
S/1717.

To the COMMANDER OF THE FOURTEENTH DIVISION, Khabarovsk:

From a conversation with Likhoidov I learned that the situation in Khabarovsk is developing in our favor. In my opinion, these people are faithful to us. Our literary secret agents Panov and Yuriev are working in a desirable manner. No expense must be spared in attaining our aims. We can always give the requested assistance, but we can not do so openly.

(Signed) OI.

But all of a sudden the whole situation changes and Toyko orders a retreat. On August 4 the war ministry gave Gen. Oi instructions just the contrary of the above:

——I.

WAR MINISTRY, Tokyo, August 4, 1920.

(A secret session. S/466.)

To the STAFF OF THE SIBERIAN EXPEDITIONARY ARMY, Vladivostok:

The Japanese Imperial Government is compelled to adopt the following decision:

The general European situation, the victories of the soviet government on the Polish front, the growing danger from the soviet government, the noticeable antipathy on the part of the United States and China, the steps undertaken by America in the question of Sakhalin, the general preparedness of the United States for war, the secret agreement between soviet Russia and Germany, compel us not to carry out our political projects in Siberia completely.

The desire of the United States that Japanese troops should evacuate Siberian territory immediately has become a very serious problem, and this problem demands extreme caution on our part.

The strong influence of Germany in China threatens us with the loss of influence.

All these problems compel us to adopt a waiting attitude. Any premature steps may ruin all our great plans. The present situation compels us to give up the plans of occupation in Siberia for some time, remaining entrenched, however, in those territories where our troops are located.

In the Japanese-Chinese question the situation compels us to make certain concessions. The greatest danger is from the soviet government, as the danger which is contained in the unity of all Russians may create unexpected obstacles for us. We can only rely upon ourselves, as the incidents in Nikolayevsk and in the entire Maritime Province made a very unfavorable impression among the Allies.

The time has come when most cautious, serious work must be done by us. We consider that it is best, and order that the troops which are at present in the maritime district should spend the winter in their present quarters. The commanders must prepare everywhere fortified winter quarters. Our trusted people must influence the situation in such a manner that our general interests would be protected under any circumstances.

Our interests demand that the Japanese imperial diplomacy should enter into close relations with the provisional Vladivostok government, but without allowing that government to become strongly entrenched.

The operations against the Amur Province must cease, but the troops must be held in readiness, as the danger from that side is still very great. The growing communist influence which we notice in every step of the present government makes a very unfavorable impression on us and on our people. We order extreme caution so that the germs of bolshevism should remain isolated, as we do not know what the results will be of the secret conference which is to take place shortly between the Allies regarding the Siberian question.

We order the war ministry to base all their actions in accordance with our decision of to-day. We order it to exercise extreme caution in military problems, as caution is essential in the affairs of the Siberian army. We order the war ministry and its officers to be extremely careful regarding the communist party, which creates more obstacles than anything else to our plans. We order the war ministry to make this decision known to the commanders of the divisions, and we believe that it will by all means advance the sacred cause of the Japanese people.

Thus Japan is prevented from completely carrying out its plans; it is compelled to change them because of the general political situation, and, mainly, because of the strength of soviet Russia and America's attitude toward Japanese annexations in the Far East.

With regard to the secret conference of the Allies mentioned above, there exists a secret telegram, which has been published, from the war minister in Tokyo, dated August 20, which was sent by a courier to Harbin.

By courier to Harbin from Tokyo. August, 1920. A/217.

For the consideration of the solution of the Siberian problem Barons Hayashi, Ishi, and Magata were sent for a conference to England. They are to discuss and decide the Siberian question. For a final settlement of the Siberian question I order the commanders or their lieutenants as well as the diplomatic representatives to be in Harbin on September 12. Neither the command nor the foreign missions must know about this secret conference. You must travel unofficially.

(Signature) WAR MINISTER.

Nothing else is known of these negotiations.

XXXV.

In the meantime Semenov's men, who were leaving eastern Transbaikalia immediately after the Japanese, fearing the armed population that had risen in despair and gone to the mountains and forests, forgot the agreement that had been signed by the Japanese in their behalf, and began to destroy the railroad and mercilessly to rob the population, driving away its herds, and the Verkhne-Udinsk government was compelled, on August 7, to remind the Japanese of the agreement of July 15.

The men of Semenov and Kappel, who had been in Chita—Kappel's men, the last remainders of the destroyed Kolchak army, had arrived in Chita as far back as February, 1920—began to disintegrate completely. Some of them began going over to the struggling partisans, the armed peasants, and another part simply dispersed, as they foresaw a bad end. A mock national assembly, which had been created by Semenov in Chita for the sake of appearances, declared itself against him; such was the indignation against him of all classes of the population, and so strong was the general conviction that he would fall very soon after the evacuation of the Japanese.

In spite of the memorandum signed by both parties on July 16, the delegation of the Verkhne-Udinsk government which started for Chita for negotiations with the representatives of the population of Chita was stopped by the Japanese at the station of Gongota. That was the Japanese assistance in bringing about the conference of the representatives.

In the month of September the delegates of Vladivostok, through the "mediation" of the Japanese, were allowed to cross the territory occupied by Semenov's men, who had encamped along the Transbaikal Railway, and to reach Verkhne-Udinsk. The results of this meeting so much displeased the Japanese—according to their opinion the Verkhne-Udinsk government was thereby strengthened—that the Japanese "information bureau" on September 11 gave vent to its wrath against the "treacherous" Verkhne-Udinsk government. The Japanese communication ended thus: "It is unnecessary to add that Japan will always be ready to answer, either by hostile acts or by peaceful means. If the far eastern Government will spurn the proffered hand of friendship extended in a spirit of pure humanity, and will try to diminish the rights of Japan as proclaimed in the Government's declaration, Japan will be ready to attack injustice and to deal heavy blows to her enemies."

XXXVI.

The Japanese were compelled to go further in their repudiation of their original extensive program until a moment arrived when nothing was left to them but to leave Likhoidov and his crowd to their own fate and to withdraw.

On September 18 a new declaration of the Japanese Government was published, reading as follows:

On the basis of the declaration made public by the Japanese Government on July 3 of this year, at the time of the evacuation of our troops from the Transbaikal Province, and as a necessary measure, until the reestablishment of order, a certain number of troops have been retained in the district of Khabarovsk, as a strategically important point leading to the Sakhalin Province. Now, in view of the settlement of the political situation in the above-mentioned district, I announce the withdrawal of our troops therefrom. At the same time I express my sincere desire that the Russian Far Eastern territory be unified as soon as possible, thus assuring the peace and prosperity of the population of the country, and securing good neighborly relations between the two peoples, the Japanese and the Russian.

Only one or two months before the Japanese, after creating the Bochkarev band, which the maritime Government had to expel by force, as well as the Likhoidov men, were loudly asserting that in Khabarovsk everything was not as it should be; but now, all of a sudden, all was "settled." Their plans having changed, their words changed also. * * *

XXXVII.

The Japanese left Transbaikalia. The population, regardless of class or situation, driven to extremity by the brutalities and the debauchery of Semenov's as well as Kappel's men (who, although somewhat unfriendly to Semenov's men, in general were helping them), rose against them and in the middle of October drove them out of Chita. Ataman Semenov barely escaped from Chita and had to flee in an airplane. The Semenov-Kappel troops encamped along the Transbaikal Railroad, leaning upon Manchuria, and, as formerly, bottled up the way between the Maritime Province and Transbaikalia. But, on the other hand, the Amur region obtained a railroad connection with Pribaikalia and a part of Transbaikalia. The Government transferred its seat immediately from Verkhne-Udinsk to Chita, which was selected as the place for the final conference of the representatives of all the Provinces.

One or two further efforts of the people, and the entire demoralized White Army withdrew in a panic to Manchuria. * * *

The Japanese, solicitous for the fate of the army that was so well serving their interests, offered their services as mediators, but, as was to be expected, nothing came of the offer. The Chinese, whose activities were being constantly watched by the Japanese, insisted on disarming the White Army that had withdrawn to Chinese territory, but the arms were delivered to the Japanese and the disarming became a farce.

The "cork" in the neck of Transbaikalia was removed. With the Japanese gone the "cork" was gone too—after having for such a long time bottled up the work of the unification of the Russian Provinces of the Far East, and after having caused such great losses to the population.

The Verkhne-Udinsk Government had already appealed many times to the White troops, proposing that they disarm and come over to the side of the people. Amnesty was granted to all, except those who had committed grave criminal offenses. Now, the Government again confirmed its amnesty to all those who would voluntarily come back. Part of the troops came back. But the major part, obviously afraid on account of the crimes committed, and egged on by the Japanese, preferred for the time being to stay in Manchuria.

XXXVIII.

Before the Japanese now arose the question concerning the further use to be made of this army. If the general political situation required of them a curtailment of their annexionist program, that did not at all mean that this program was to be given up altogether. Not in vain had they expended so many efforts, lives, and funds.

The valuable Maritime Province, including Vladivostok, was still in the clutches of the Japanese, and now, after having suffered so much, it became the central point of the Japanese "policy."

The bandit "army" which could not fight but could kill and rob the peaceful population was gradually transferred to the Maritime Province with the usual Japanese humbugging. While declaring to the maritime government that they were not interfering in the question of the transfer, the Japanese were at the same time transferring the bandits with the help of Chinese officials and subordinates of Chang-Tso-lin, the military head of Manchuria.

Semenov's men were sent to Grodekovo, a Cossack center, the Kappel men to Nikolsk, Razdolnoye and other places, without paying any attention to the protests of the maritime government and the national assembly. With reference to Kappel's army it will suffice to say that its representatives had previously come to Vladivostok to negotiate with the government; and when the government proposed to them that they should submit to its command and place themselves completely at its disposal, under absolute guaranty of the inviolability of their persons, they rejected this offer, insisting upon their complete independence.

The Japanese were fulminating against the Verkhne-Udinsk government, which had already moved to Chita, declaring that this government having permitted the armed expulsion of Semenov, had violated the agreement of July 15. The Japanese began to look around for a pretext to give support to the Semenov men.

The partisans, having approached the Manchurian border, did not continue the pursuit of Semenov's men, as they did not want to fight on foreign territory; but Semenov's men, as well as the Japanese, were waiting for another opportunity and were preparing other plans as appeared from the order of Gen. Semenov issued on November 18, at Junction 86 (on the territory of Transbaikalia, a few miles from the station Manchuria):

Order of the commander in chief of the armed forces and the campaign Ataman of all the Cossack forces in the Russian Far Eastern borderland.

The political situation at the present moment is as follows: The Japanese command, in the person of its representative, Col. Isome, guarantees to the Far Eastern army its transfer to the maritime district, but at the present time Col. Isome has not a sufficient number of armed forces at his disposal to cover up our retreat. The Chinese command promises definite assistance only in the work of transporting and quartering our families and relatives. The armed forces of the Chinese in the district of Manchuria are also insufficient and unreliable, and we can not figure on them to cover up our retreat. Therefore, in order to create a precedent of an international character and to give cause to the Japanese command to move their troops decisively, and by removing the Chinese from the railroad line to close the frontier to the Reds, it is necessary, in case the situation at the front will compel us to do so, to penetrate as far as possible into the territory of the Chinese Eastern Railroad, avoiding and not taking into consideration the Chinese troops at the frontier.

For the purpose of accomplishing the above, I order parts of the First Abagatui Corps to move in the direction of Hailar, where it should remain until further orders. The Orenburg Cossack Brigade must follow the first corps. Troops of the second and third corps, after encircling station Manchuria from the south, are to enter the district of stations Sagan and Horson. Station Chzhalainor is not to be occupied. Small units of no military importance may go through station Manchuria, where they are to surrender arms to the Japanese mission; and it is necessary that all these movements begin simultaneously, so that the units which will come to station Manchuria be secured from all possible excess on the part of the Chinese by the presence of our military units in the rear of the Chinese forces.

After the execution of the above operation we shall have assured for ourselves further movement along the railroad line.

I appeal to all, from the general to the soldier, to maintain absolute presence of mind and not to lose hope in the favorable outcome of our struggle for the right and freedom of the people.

(Signed, on the original) LIEUT. GEN. SEMENOV.

Correct copy: CHIEF OF STAFF OF THE FIRST TRANSBAIKAL CAVALRY BRIGADE PETELIN.

This plan was divulged in time and therefore could not be put into execution.

The transfer of troops to the Maritime Province was accomplished. Semenov had, apparently, to be transported somewhere else for a certain time, and thus the Japanese, their former declarations to the contrary notwithstanding, addressed to Gen. Boldyrev, commander of the troops of the maritime government, the following official announcement:

By order of Gen. Oi, the commander in chief, I beg to inform you hereby of the following:

The detachments of Semenov's and Kappel's men have been disarmed in Manchuria by agreement between Japan and China. The transfer of some of them who would like to proceed to the territory of the Eastern Chinese Railway and to the Maritime Province should be arranged by direct communications with the Chinese Government and with the provisional maritime government. In consideration of this fact, the Japanese command is standing completely aside in this matter as not pertaining to its jurisdiction.

According to news received there is among them Ataman Semenov, who applied for protection to the Japanese command. Confirming the above-mentioned arrangement the commander in chief of the Japanese troops has decided that he should be forced to leave the Maritime Province.

MAJ. GEN. TAKAYANAGI,
The Chief of the Staff of the Japanese Troops.

VLADIVOSTOK, November 28, 1920.

This document does not require any further comments.

XXXIX.

As soon as the various regions of the Far East had obtained the possibility of free communications and exchange of opinions the representatives of the various provincial governments and of the national assemblies, then in session, gathered in Chita. This conference, which took place on November 9, finally united all the Far Eastern Provinces. The declaration of independence was confirmed, the day of the elections to the constituent assembly was fixed, and the suffrage law for these elections adopted (Kerensky's law concerning universal suffrage); a central government of the Far Eastern Republic was created and it was intrusted with carrying out the elections; Chita was selected as the capital of the Republic.

It was unanimously decided to ask for the cessation of the intervention. All officers and soldiers, the remainders of the armies of Kolchak and Semenov, were invited to return to peaceful work, inviolability of person being guaranteed them. In the spirit of these decisions a declaration of the unity conference of the Provinces of the Far East was issued, in which the foreign governments were invited to enter into close political and economic relations with the central government of the Far Eastern Republic.

The Japanese—seeing the futulity of all their efforts, as the people of the Russian Far East still continued to consider themselves a sovereign nation unwilling to recognize foreign rule on its territory, and determined to submit only to their own will as expressed by their elected representative organs—began to exert a pressure upon the maritime government and the national assembly, menacing them with repressions if the national assembly should confirm the decisions of the conference of November 9.

For a couple of days Vladivostok was filled with rumors concerning an intended overthrow; in Grodekovo, which the Japanese converted into a local "cork," after the Chita model, by populating it with Semenov's army, a belligerent spirit was induced. Gen. Oi summoned the members of the national assembly, who were the representatives of all political parties, kept them waiting for about an hour in a dark room, and finally came out to harangue and warn them of the evil consequences which would ensue if the national assembly should recognize the work of the Chita conference and the "communist" (as the Japanese called it) central government that was elected there. (The majority of the members of the government were communists, but as a whole the government was a coalition government.) Gen. Oi handed to all of them the following declaration:

To-day I invited you, the representatives of all political parties and groups of the national assembly, in order to acquaint you with the stand taken by the Japanese command and its attitude toward the provisional government. As the political situation in this territory has become serious, in connection with the conference in Chita dealing with the unity of the country, I wish to point out to you that I have repeatedly announced that in order to prevent undesirable conflicts and to preserve peace and order in the country a communist administration will not be allowed in those regions in which Japanese troops are stationed. But judging from what is here going on under the influence of the Chita unity conference, the situation is rather serious; I am afraid that in the regions in which Japanese troops are stationed peace and order may be disturbed. I wish to inform you that in the interest of Japanese self-defense, as well as for the maintenance of order in the country, there was drawn up an agreement between the Japanese command and the provincial government concerning the cessation of military activities; there was also an exchange of memorandums concerning the establishment of a buffer State, which, independently from the work going on at the conference in Chita, are binding upon both parties. Should therefore any third party, whosoever it may be, against the will and without the knowledge of the Japanese command, venture to violate the existing order in the zone in which the Japanese troops are stationed, and thus provoke disturbances in the country, such an activity will under no circumstances be tolerated by the Japanese military command. In concluding my address, I wish to express to you my profound respect for your efforts toward the regeneration of the country.

All the delegates, regardless of party affiliation, were deeply offended to be treated as if they were on enemy territory and not in their own country.

The agreements with the Maritime Government, mentioned by Gen. Oi, are those agreements which were forced by the Japanese upon the government after the events of April 4–5, i. e., the agreements of April 5 and 29. "The memorandums concerning the establishment of the buffer state" are the letters reprinted in the second part of this book, which, on the insistence of the Japanese, the chairman of the Japanese and Russian sections of the Russo-Japanese Adjustment Commission exchanged with each other in Vladivostok when the sessions of the conference were going on it Chita. These memorandums are drafted in the spirit of the memorandum of July 16, already mentioned above, which was signed by the representatives of the Verkhne-Udinsk Government at the Station Gongota.

Similar memorandums were exchanged between the Japanese and the representatives of the Amur Province. In general, being themselves much addicted to declarations, they go so far as to force other people also to write them.

In order to make their presence felt, the Japanese began to hold up trains, not allowing anything to pass beyond the zone where their troops were stationed (Station Yevgenyevka); they prohibited the sending out of the city of silver money, with which the Government paid its employees, etc.

In spite by all these measures, the Maritime national assembly, taught by its bitter experiences with the Japanese and placing the cause of the unity of all Russian provinces above all the Japanese threats, confirmed the work of the conference, recognizing the government elected in Chita as the central government.

That the Japanese arguments as to the "communist" composition of the Chita Government were only a pretext for the outside world is proved by the fact that the Maritime Government, with which the Japanese were having their sport, and which they wanted to tear away from Chita, thus destroying the work of unity, was of similar composition; the majority here, too, was "communist"; but in their essential policy both were equally democratic.

Having failed, the Japanese did not put their threats immediately into effect, but the Maritime populaion felt that under the leadership of the Japanese all the White Guards who had been transferred thither were being organized for the overthrow of the Government, with the purpose of creating an independent reactionary state out of the Maritime Province, which would continuously menace the Far Eastern Republic, thus destroying the already achieved unity of the Russian Far East.

XLI.

While everywhere provoking disorders and keeping the entire population in a state of tension, the Japanese began (in January, 1921) to spread the rumor in Vladivostok that in view of the fact that the situation in the Far East was menacing the life and property of the foreigners, the consular body intrusted the Japanese with the defense and the protection of the interests of foreigners. The population which, after all the bitter experiences it had gone through, understood the meaning of these rumors was prepared for new Japanese attacks.

On January 28 the papers published the following announcement from the American Consul:

The Government of the United States of America has not applied to any other Government with the request to collaborate with its representatives or the local authorities for the defense of the life and the property of American citizens in Siberia, and has not counted upon such protection. The Government of the United States is also unaware of the fact that any other Government has made such a request or counted upon such help, or would like to commit to any Government whatsoever the protection of the interests of other nationalities or to accept the task of protecting the personal safety or the property of any other nationalities in Siberia.

Thus another Japanese provocation was unmasked.

XLII.

In spite of the fact that in the Fisheries Convention of 1907 Japan obtained substantial rights for the exploitation of fisheries along the Russian Pacific coast (equal rights with Russian citizens everywhere, except the bays and the internal river waters), the Japanese were not satisfied. Already at the time of the deliberations of the various items of the convention, the Japanese were assiduously but unsuccessfully insisting upon the right to hunt beavers and sea bears in Russian waters, as well as upon the right to fish in bays and rivers. After 1907 Japan very extensively availed herself of her rights and developed this industry. But this was not enough for her; she wanted equal rights with the Russians in all things connected with fisheries.

This question was persistently brought to the fore in 1916, when the Czar's Government, conducting war with Germany, was in a difficult position, and "allied" Japan was considered the defender of the Far Eastern Russian possessions against possible attack. The downfall of the Czar's Government changed the situation, and the revolutions, both of March and of November, created such favorable conditions for the Japanese that they could not resist the great temptation of obtaining the realization of their old plans. Civil war and intervention completely weakened the Russian fisheries and reduced them practically to insignificance. Almost the entire fishery industry passed into Japanese hands. A long correspondence went on between the provisional maritime government (provincial zemstvo board) and the Japanese, concerning various privileges which the Japanese were asking in the fisheries industry. But even this did not satisfy them, because, in connection with their general scheme of conquest, they had planned not only economic preponderance but also to secure possession of the enormous natural resources, particularly the fisheries of the Russian Far East.

On December 16, 1920, the Japanese imperial consul sent the following communication to the director of foreign affairs of the Vladivostok government:

With regard to the fisheries in the Sakhalin district I consider it my duty, in accordance with the instructions of the minister of foreign affairs, to inform you as follows: The fisheries in the lower part of the Amur River, as well as in the Amur estuary, including the islands of Langer, Ud, etc., will from now on be under the jurisdiction of the Japanese command. As for the fisheries in the remaining parts of northern Sakhalin and in the waters of the coast from Cape Lezarev to De Castri, which up to the present were under the jurisdiction of the Russian authorities in Vladivostok, they will henceforth also be under the jurisdiction of the Japanese command.

This short but exceedingly interesting document immediately suggests a number of thoughts which are not complimentary to Japanese policy.

1. As far back as four months before the Nikolayevsk events, the Japanese had already seized the Russian fisheries resources of Sakhalin and the lower part of the Amur River (of the entire Sakhalin district).

2. The fisheries came under Japanese control, not as a result of competition between the business men concerned in the fishing industry, but by military conquest—"they are under the jurisdiction of the Japanese command."

3. In seizing them the Japanese do not even consider it necessary to disguise or to assign any reasons for it.

This document, communicated from Vladivostok to Chita, brought forth an immediate protest on the part of the Government:

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic protests against the forcible seizure which is a violation of the rights of the Russian people and its territorial sovereignty. This fact is in glaring contradiction to all the declarations by the Japanese Government of its unchanging respect for the rights of the Russian Nation, its territorial integrity and sovereignty.

On January 17, 1921, the Japanese delivered to the Vladivostok provincial government a new note in which five demands are put forth, which are in complete violation of Russian rights in general and of the fisheries convention in particular. These demands were supported by statements of the losses which the Japanese concerned in the fishing industry had sustained in connection with the disorders of 1918, 1919, and 1920. The demands were as follows:

1. The Russian authorities must deposit the fees which they receive for the lease of fisheries in an especially designated credit establishment on terms to be fixed by agreement with the Japanese Government. The Russian authorities may, at their discretion, withdraw and expend a third of the money deposited for the maintenance of the personnel supervising the fisheries and for other items, and the destination of the remaining two-thirds will be determined, according to mutual agreement of both Governments, after the end of the corresponding fishing season. The Russian authorities will accurately enter the receipts and expenditures connected with the payment for the leases, and the Japanese consul in Vladivostok will, if he deems it necessary, examine the books and watch over the correctness of the accounting.

2. In enumerating the fisheries, the Russian authorties will have to include their budgets. (Reason: The prices for the fisheries have supposedly become too high owing to competitive offers.)

3. Shipping certificates and all certificates of any kind necessary in connection with the fishing industry are issued not only by Russian but also by Japanese authorities.

4. The right of coasting trade, and, in addition to this, the right of domiciling Japanese subjects, even after the end of the fishing season, until the next season, for the purpose of protecting the buildings and the equipment therein.

5. The Japanese have the same right as the Russians to fish in the bights and in the rivers.

The Japanese had said almost everything and were waiting for an answer, but they did not receive any answer from the Government. On February 14 they again forwarded a note in which they insisted upon a favorable reply.

On the following day, on February 15, an announcement of the Japanese consul general was published, the contents of which were as follows:

With reference to the communication of the head of the Japanese diplomatic mission (i. e., Consul Kikuchi) to the local authorties, represented by B. E. Skvirsky, of December 16, 1920, concerning the taking over of all fisheries of the Sakhalin district by the Japanese command, I applied to the proper authorities, represented by D. P. Pantekyev, in my request of January 18 of the current year, asking him to omit the following fisheries—for the catching of fish and crabs—from the list of the fisheries that are to be leased in the course of the current year:

Fishing 68-a, Agnevsky 2; fishing 68b, Agnevsky 5; crabbing 6, Pilevinsky; crabbing 27, Aspidsky; crabbing 28, Nanaysky.

In view of the fact that no answer has been given as yet to my aforesaid communication, I have been instructed by the Government to make the following announcement: The leasing of the above-mentioned fisheries by means of auctions, which in the course of the current year were arranged by the Russian authorities, will not be recognized by the Japanese Government.

Thus, after their note of December 16, concerning the fisheries, against which the Government protested, the Japanese considered themselves full masters of the Sakhalin coast line and of the lower part of the Amur.

By the way, it is interesting to dwell on the following fact: All their notes concerning fisheries, etc., the Japanese diplomats, as well as the military authorities, persistently directed not to the central government in Chita, but to the Vladivostok government; when the representatives of this Government, after the conference of November 9, refused to accept such documents, the Japanese simply placed them on the desk and walked off. It is interesting to compare with this fact the first clause of the memorandum signed by the Japanese and the Russians at Gongota on July 16:

The Japanese delegation declared that individual contacts of the Japanese command with the local authorities will cease immediately after the termination of the work of the conference of representatives expressing lawfully and independently the will of the Russian population of the Far East and which will legalize the final establishment of a single government.

After the conference of November 9, i. e., the conference above referred to, the Japanese persistently endeavored not to mention this clause which they had signed.

After this announcement the Government of the Far Eastern Republic in the beginning of March again protested against the Japanese usurpations:

The disorders which took place in 1918, 1919, and 1920 are the direct consequence of the policies of the Japanese command, which has completely ignored the sovereign rights of the Russian people in Russian territory. The last verbal notes which were delivered on January 17 by the Japanese consul general, as well as the memorandum of the Japanese consul general of December 16, 1920, are considered by the Government as infringements upon the rights of the Russian people, and the Government reiterates its protest of January 19, 1921.

On March 14 the Government of the Far Eastern Republic gave a detailed answer to the five Japanese demands of January 17. In this reply the Government declares that the Japanese should reestablish the normal conditions prevailing before the seizure of the fisheries; that the Government is not opposed to satisfying the legitimate needs of the Japanese fishing industry, and that it furthermore is not opposed to the revision, by the interested parties, of the entire fisheries convention. But such an answer could, of course, not satisfy the Japanese. They were expecting a resigned submission. On April 18 their answer to the reply of the Government of the Far Eastern Republic of March 14 was delivered. This answer has the same characteristics as the former ones—they can not wait, and therefore take matters in their own hands, and consequently will allow the Japanese fishermen to exploit the fisheries according to terms drawn up by them under the protection of the Japanese military authorities.

And on April 12, under the instructions of the Japanese Government, the Japanese consulate general in Vladivostok announced that the head of the military administrative department of the Japanese command in Sakhalin published a notice of February 19, 1921, concerning the leasing by auction of fisheries to Russians, the office of the military administrative command in Sakhalin (Alexandrovsk) being designated as the place for the auction. In this announcement it is pointed out that "persons who want to consult the above-mentioned list, as well as the regulations and rules, may consult them in the Japanese language in the consulate." Thus Russian fisheries are leased to Russians by the Japanese, who propose to the Russians that they acquaint themselves with the Japanese rules, etc., in the Japanese language!

It is a situation that requires no comment.

XLIII.

After the declaration of July 3 (evacuation of Transbaikalia and occupation of the Sakhalin district) the Japanese did not say anything about Sakhalin, and only eight months later, on March 21, in Alexandrovsk, Lieut. Gen. Kozima, commander in chief of the expeditionary army in the Sakhalin district, published the following order:

On the basis of the declaration published last summer, in which the Japanese Imperial Government announced that the Japanese troops will occupy important points in the Sakhalin district until the time when a lawful government will be organized in Russia and the question of the barbarous killing of the Japanese in Nikolayevsk will be settled, the Japanese Expeditionary Army will within the next days distribute its troops in the towns of De-Castri, Nikolayevsk, Mago, Sofisk, and other places, and will establish in these localities a civil administration in order to introduce there peace and order.

I appeal to the entire local population to peacefully occupy themselves with their affairs and to submit to the authorities named by us.

Soon complaints began to arrive from the population of Nikolayevsk, Marinsk, and other places reporting that the Japanese were interfering with the work of the Russian Government organs; that they prevented them from communicating with the Russian superior authorities; and that in general they were introducing a complete Japanese administration.

On April 19 a Japanese transport arrived in De Castri and landed troops, a Japanese radio was erected there, the Russian telegraph was put under Japanese censorship, and communication with the Russian higher authorities without the permission of the Japanese was prohibited.

On May 29 the head of the military mission, who came to Marinsk with the Japanese detachment, made the following announcement to the chairman of the district board:

We herewith communicate to you the order which we received from Lieut. Gen. Kozima, commander of the army of the Sakhalin district: The Chita Government and the people of the Far Eastern Republic ought to know the contents of an announcement concerning important matters referring to the former Sakhalin district. On the basis of this announcement the activities of any other administration and of its representatives in the occupied territory is not allowed. On the basis of this order we invite you, the representatives of the Far Eastern Republic, a Government which we have not recognized as yet, to cease your activity.

On July 14, 1920, the Japanese command made the following announcement:

In the near future Japan will inaugurate a military administration in the Russian part of Sakhalin.

For this reason—

1. All institutions must hand over their affairs to the Japanese command beginning with July 25.

[NOTE.—The majority of the officials and employees will remain in their former positions.]

2. Those who live in the buildings belonging to the State or to the community must leave them on the above date.

3. It is strictly prohibited to carry away from the above-mentioned buildings papers, instruments, supplies, etc.

The inhabitants were immediately told that if in the course of seven days they would not submit proofs that all their rights or privileges had been acquired from the Russian Government, these rights and privileges would not be recognized.

Not less interesting was the announcement that was sent to the Russian authorities on August 24 by Gen. Kozima and head of the military administrative board, Tsuno:

(a) Beginning with the 1st of July the rights of the Russian Government are not recognized.

(b) The Russian administration is considered to be abolished and consequently also all its decrees concerning the exploitation of natural resources.

(c) Property rights shall be determined upon investigation.

(d) For the settlement of administrative and other important matters an investigator shall be appointed, who shall examine the material and give the necessary explanations.

(e) The Japanese authorities will take care of the trustworthy personnel of the Russian administration.

(f) All material of an administrative character will remain in the hands of the persons who were in charge before.

(g) Should the above-mentioned points not be adhered to the necessary measures will be taken.

The Japanese law concerning capital punishment was introduced (with the application of execution) and the whole conduct of life was taken in hand by the Japanese, who issued a great number of regulations. In the "Rules concerning the supervision of resident foreigners" the Russions were converted into foreigners, and apparently foreigners of the second class.

The first clause of these rules reads as follows:

Foreigners who intend to come from abroad into the region which is ruled by the Japanese civilian administration must have with them a passport or a certificate of nationality issued by their Government.

The aforesaid passport or certificate, on which a photograph is pasted, must be visèed by the Japanese ambassadors, envoys, or consuls.

All foreigners coming from Japan, not excluding Russians and Chinese, must be provided with a certificate issued by the Japanese authorities.

On the above-mentioned certificate must be pasted a photograph, especially in the case of Russians and Chinese, and this can not be replaced by the description of the person's appearance.

The order "Concerning the supervision of the mining industry," issued on August 30, stipulates that:

1. Applications concerning the acquisition of rights in the mining industry shall not be received for the time being.

2. The granting of rights concerning the mining industry is discontinued for the time being.

4. The exercise of rights concerning the mining industry is prohibited for the time being, except in cases where the mining rights have been already enforced and the exploitation is actually in progress.

5. The head of the military administrative board is entitled, if he deems it necessary, to limit the rights concerning the mining industry or forbid their exercise altogether, and so on.

This order brought forth the protest of even that adherent of the Japanese interventionist policy, Mr. Krupensky, the Czar's ambassador in Tokyo. On November 25, 1920 (No. 635), protesting against the clauses 2, 4, and 5, Krupensky declared: "The above-mentioned points are nothing else but an abolishment of Russian laws on Russian territory by Japanese authorities, which appropriated for themselves the rights of territorial supremacy, and the order as a whole is in contradiction with the meaning and the spirit of the declaration of the Japanese Imperial Government of July 3 of the current year, as well as with the oral assurances given to me in this respect by your excellency (the minister of foreign affairs). I consider it my duty to call the attention of the Japanese Government to this matter and to protest against this order which violates Russian interests."

The Japanese continued and still continue in their work, and have finally gone to such lengths that they have even renamed the streets with Japanese names. The Japanese know the value of the Sakhalin district very highly—Sakhalin coal, Sakhalin oil, its inexhaustible fishing wealth, is for them a sufficient attraction not to heed the Russian protests or the protests of the Government of the United States. Moreover, the occupied territory is strategically very valuable; the Far Eastern Republic can from this vantage ground be incessantly threatened and thus forced to grant anything that the Japanese imperialists may want.

XLIV.

As appears from the above, the Japanese were doing and were ready to do anything that would lead to the realization of their designs on the Russian Far East. Knowing the difficulties in which France found herself after Wrangel's army was destroyed in the Crimea and evacuated from Russian territory; knowing the desire of France to continue the struggle against soviet Russia at any price, the Japanese began, in January, 1921, to negotiate with the French Government for sending this entire army to the Russian Far East and duly exploiting it as a fighting force. But first of all Japan presented a great number of demands, the meaning of which was a silent but nevertheless a real and undivided protectorate over the territory of the Far East which was occupied by the Far Eastern Republic.

The French willingly granted Japan freedom of action in the Russian Far East on the condition that the Wrangel troops should be transferred and used by the Japanese and that the Japanese, after satisfying their appetites, should give preference to the French over other foreigners in the matter of concessions. Japan had to furnish the shipping tonnage, but the French Government did not refuse to defray the expenses connected with the transfer of the troops. The central figure in the organization of this affair was subsequently to be Tirbakh, a former adjutant of Kolchak, who came from Paris to Shanghai especially for this purpose. The Japanese intended to put Semenov at the head of the troops should the transfer succeed. In this spirit negotiations were conducted with him in Port Arthur, where he was residing. It was taken for granted that the person who would be at the head of the army and the "government" which would take the place of the present government of the Far Eastern Republic would irrevocably agree to full Japanese control in military as well as in civil affairs. The natural resources were also to come under the complete disposal of Japan.

Thus Japan was not losing heart. All her failures only stimulated her to further devices.

But here, too, Japan made an error in her calculation. The United States crossed her path, and Japan was again forced temporarily to slow down.

XLV.

In the meantime the government of the Far Eastern Republic, elected at the conference of February 9, went its own way and, basing itself on the provincial authorities, was executing the decisions taken by this conference. Under the supervision of a commission that was elected on a coalition basis the elections to the constituent assembly were going on. But the Semenov and Kappel "democrats," although warring against each other, tried wherever possible to break up these elections, killing members of the electing commissions, etc. Fortunately they had gathered only on a small part of the territory of the Far Eastern Republic, viz, the southern part of the Maritime Province, not occupying even this portion completely, and thus could not do any harm. The elections were a brilliant success, and gave an overwhelming preponderance to the representatives of the peasants.

The constituent assembly was to be the last stage in the struggle for the democratic republic in the Far East, and all those who had at heart the success of that republic were naturally bound at that moment to help the government.

From what the Japanese were doing all the time it could not be observed that they had any sympathy for the success of the Russian population, which, in spite of the many great obstacles, had succeeded in uniting all the Provinces and was beginning its labors in the arts of peace. The heroic population was starving in order to give the government an opportunity to conduct its difficult work in the atmosphere of assassination with which it was surrounded. The Japanese, as was already shown before, converted Grodekovo into a new "cork," such as Chita had been before. There Semenov's men committed their excesses, taking passengers off the trains (those who were abducted disappeared, nobody knows where), robbing and assaulting the population. According to the agreement of April 29, 1920, the Japanese were not to admit armed Russian groups to the zone where Japanese troops were stationed, but the Japanese, who were so often referring to this agreement, forgot about it whenever they themselves were helping to arm and organize these troops.

What Semenov's men were doing at that time under the protection of the Japanese appears from the depositions of a general of the Kappel forces (Molchanov) which the latter made in the beginning of March before the commission of the national assembly that was investigating the murders that had taken place in Razdolnoye (district of Nikolsk-Usurisk, Maritime Province). According to the statement of this general the murders which took place in Razdolnoye, where his soldiers were stationed, forced him to entrust his intelligence department with the investigation of this matter. As a result it was established that all the murders were committed according to a previously elaborated plan and had the purpose of provoking an open conflict between the Kappel army and the population. According to this plan more than 100 persons were to be killed, including all the educated elements of the village. The group that was organized for the execution of this plan included also officers. The circumstances of the murders were arranged in such a way that they should suggest a purely criminal origin, having nothing in common with politics. The names of the three persons who were at the head of this organization also became known.

Gen. Molchanov applied to the representatives of the Japanese command, asking them to take the necessary steps for the arrest of the criminals; the interpreter of these representatives replied that they, too, were very indignant over these murders, and that they were ready to collaborate in the struggle against crime. Filled with hope by this answer, Gen. Molchanov asked the interpreter, "Will the criminals be arrested if I indicate their names?" The answer was, "Surely; the Japanese command will certainly arrest them."

Then Gen. Molchanov repeated the names of the main participants in these murders; they were all agents of the Japanese General Staff. The Japanese, terribly taken aback, refused to have them arrested. Thereupon Gen. Molchanov proposed that they should be guaranteed safety by the organization of a common guard, consisting of two Japanese and two members of his army; this guard would dispatch the murderers to the Vladivostok prison.

The Japanese did not agree to this, but the murders ceased after this conversation, and their organizers disappeared from Razdolnoye, fleeing to Grodekovo, which had been their steady haunt. In the note of the minister of foreign affairs of the Far Eastern Republic, addressed to the minister of foreign affairs of the Japanese Government, of March 7, 1921, attention is called to these facts:

Incessant murders of absolutely innocent persons, committed by armed bandits, calling themselves Semenov's men, etc., have been irritating and disturbing, and are still irritating and disturbing the population. A short while ago these criminals again shed blood; several scores of people were killed in the settlements Razdolnoye, Khotol, and Zharikovo; the population in Fadeyevka was disarmed and left at the mercy of the Khun-Khuses, and several citizens were abducted to an unknown destination.

In spite of the glaring crimes of Semenov's men, who have gathered in Grodekovo and are now gathering in other places, too, in spite of the protests of the Russian authorities against the unlawful gathering of armed forces in Grodekovo, in spite of the numerous attempts of these authorities to send militia for the disarming of these bands and for establishing order, the Japanese command systematically refuses to settle this question, pretending to ignore the fact that armed forces are living at Grodekovo, a fact which is only too well known to all persons residing in the maritime Province, and especially to those who have had the misfortune to pass through or to arrive at Grodekovo. Matters have gone so far that on February 8, of the current year, the former Col. Dombel, who, on the basis of a mandate from Semenov, calls himself the head of the military communications of the army of Grodekovo, without any ceremonies openly declared that all the ranks and institutions of what was formerly Kappel's army are abolished, if the persons occupying them will not declare that they submit to Gen. Savelyev, commander of the army of Grodekovo.

We are informed by the local authorities that when Gen. Ochi, the aide-de-camp of the Japanese Emperor, passed Grodekovo the commanding staff of this army, at the head of which was the abovementioned Gen. Savelyev, was introduced to him and the armed forces were reviewed.

It is evident that all the protests and appeals of the government of the Far Eastern Republic to the Japanese Government were a voice in the wilderness. The reactionary bands were organized for action.

In the night of March 30-31 an attempt was made to overthrow the Government in Vladivostok, and the Japanese, "true" to the agreement that they had imposed upon the local authorities on April 29, disarmed—not the White Guard bands which had attacked the Government—but the lawful militia, whose duty it was to defend peace and order.

This revolt failed, but the Japanese did not lose heart. The counter-revolutionary activities were not interrupted.

On May 20, owing to the persistent efforts of the Vladivostok authorities, there was found a "shelter" and a storehouse for arms of the White Guards in a house over which the Japanese flag was flying. The search was interrupted by the intervention of Japanese soldiers and gendarmes, because, as they said, "the search offended the honor and the dignity of the Japanese flag."

As a "punishment" for this search the Japanese disarmed for several hours the militia and the escort of the commander of the Russian troops.

On May 26 the White Guards again made an attack and this time, after the Japanese had disarmed the Government militia, they succeeded in seizing the power. The same thing happened in Nikolsk.

Thus was created the so-called Merkulov Government, that is based upon the Kappel and Semenov troops, which are—as was shown above—warring against each other, but which in reality do not differ much from each other.

The Japanese had gotten what they wanted: The maritime Province was severed from Chita; the unity of the far eastern Republic was violated, and it was possible to put still more obstacles in the way of the work of the Government.

But, curiously enough, schooled by long experience in the entire Far East, the Japanese are themselves never certain of their final success, and therefore are developing a many-faced activity, proceeding simultaneously in different directions, which at the first glance may seem to exclude each other. After having overthrown the Vladivostok Government, they at the same time are concealing its members in their general staff, to protect them against the counter-revolutionists. The Japanese, who so eagerly wanted to exterminate all "communists," all of a sudden are hiding three representatives of the Government who just happen all to be communists. Two days after the overthrow, the Japanese handed to these three persons the following announcement:

Declaration of the Japanese command, delivered on May 28, 1921, by Col. Yamatoto to Messrs. Antonov, Zeitlin, and Maslennikov, the representatives of the lawful authorities of the maritime Province, after the overthrow of May 26:

1. You are free to depart wherever you please. If you intend to go to Khabarovsk, the cars that are necessary for this purpose will be granted to you by the Japanese command, and the cars will be protected.

2. However, the command does not consider the Vladivostok Government as completely overthrown, and at the same time it does not recognize the creation of the new Government, and for this reason the command does not think that your immediate departure from Vladivostok is desirable.

3. If you remain here, help will be extended to you for your communications with Chita and Khabarovsk, the same as to our military missions.

4. The command does not want you to conduct under its protection any perceptible political activity, but it has no objections against your meeting certain persons, and therefore in this case collaboration will be extended to you.

A truly "oriental" document—but the ingeniousness of this Japanese game will be visible only below—overthrowing the provincial government and at the same time dallying with it; starting also a game with the government of the Far Eastern Republic, they were preparing at the same time a new big attack against the Far Eastern Republic. For the execution of their new plan it was necessary for the Japanese that Semenov, their permanent chief hireling in such work, should come—as the Japanese, in spite of all their efforts, could not find another man who would be such a willing tool. But Semenov had to be brought from Port Arthur, where he was "resting" after his flight from Chita, and passed through Vladivostok under Japanese protection.

In connection with the execution of their plan, the Japanese gave special, and, of course, secret, instructions to the Japanese gendarmerie command, represented by Okimoto, the chief of the gendarmerie detachment, and Col. Yama (June 22, 1921).

These instructions were as follows:

1. On the basis of a secret agreement that was concluded in Port Arthur, the Japanese command should help Ataman Semenov in his landing in Vladivostok.

2. Should there occur a clash, after the landing of Ataman Semenov, between the Kappel and the Semenov men, the Japanese command must disarm both sides.

3. Semenov intends to stay in Vladivostok for a long time. He intends to proclaim himself commander in chief of all the armed forces of the Far East and to declare a mobilization. The Japanese command should watch the frame of mind of the population.

As soon as Semenov landed, there immediately followed a conflict between him and the Kappel men. Semenov submitted to the Merkulov Government a great number of demands, but Merkulov's Government treated these demands as if they were tendered by Ataman Semenov in his capacity as a private individual.

The Japanese, dissatisfied with this turn of affairs, gave new instructions:

1. In order to prevent clashes between the Kappel and the Semenov men, Col. Gomi is instructed to negotiate with Ataman Semenov and to suggest that he go to Grodekovo.

2. The Japanese command should secretly extend help to Ataman Semenov after he reaches Grodekovo.

3. If the Merkulov Government arrests Ataman Semenov, the Japanese command should protest and ask for his liberation.

4. During the absence of Ataman Semenov a clash might occur in Vladivostok between the Kappel and the Semenov men. The Japanese command should disarm both sides.

The bitter hostility between the Kappel and Semenov men, which had already begun in Chita, was one of the unexpected obstacles. The plan of the new attack against the Far Eastern Republic was conceived in the following manner: From Mongolia the attack was to be made by Baron Ungern, Semenov's assistant, a Japanese agent, who, as soon as there was a serious menace from Verkhne-Udinsk, was sent by the Japanese with a detachment to Mongolia to seize the power there, to organize an army, and to wait for orders for an attack. Ungern was to advance to Troitskosavsk, take Verkhne-Udinsk and Chita; from the Amur an attack was to be made by Gen. Sychev, whose detachments were stationed on the Chinese bank of the Amur River; Sychev was to cross over to Russian territory and take Blagosvyshchensk; from Grodekovo toward Iman and Khabarovsk the attack was to be led by "Ataman Semenov himself."

Thus, in the case of success, the entire territory of the Far Eastern Republic was to be occupied by "Russian" troops and the Japanese would have obtained their aim—a far eastern "republic" under Japanese protectorate.

The secret agreement between the Semenov generals and the Japanese, which is printed below, exposes the whole deal:

(Absolutely confidential.)

TREATY.

THE FORTRESS VLADIVOSTOK, June 8, 1921.

We, the undersigned, on one side, acting commander in chief of all the armed forces and the campaign Ataman of all the Cossack troops of the Russian eastern borderland, commander of the Grodekovo group of forces, Lieut. Gen. Saveliev, and chief of staff of the Grodekovo group of forces, major general of the general staff, Sobolev, and on the other side the representatives of the diplomatic mission with the staff of the eleventh division of the Japanese imperial forces, Capt. Arimoto and Lieut. Higuchi, on the strength of authority given to us by the commander in chief of all the armed forces and of the campaign Ataman of all the Cossack forces of the Russian eastern borderland, and the chief of staff of the Japanese expeditionary forces in Siberia, conclude this treaty regarding the following:

1. The forces intrusted to me are to make an offensive against the people's revolutionary army of the Far Eastern Republic.

The offensive is carried out in accordance with the following plan:

(a) The first Grodekovo military unit moves in the direction of the Lake Hanka Anuchino, where it joins with the units of the second northern (Khabarovsk) military unit.

(b) The second northern (Khabarovsk) military unit starts out simultaneously with the first unit in the direction of Anuchino-Iman, where it joins the units of the first group.

(c) The individual units of the third Vladivostok group are transferred by sea to the Bays St. Olga Tetiukha and march in the direction of Anuchino, where they join the units of the first and second groups.

(d) Small partisan detachments of the Ussuri Cossacks are reorganized and are used for clearing the rear of the army from the Reds as it advances.

(e) The date of the active offensive is appointed by agreement with the Japanese command, not later than July 1, 1921.

(f) In accordance with the degree of success of the offensive and as the military units in the district of Anuchino-Iman, the offensive movement against Khabarovsk is to be started.

(g) Partisan units of Maj. Gen. Sychev, by order of the chief of staff of the commander in chief, must cross the Chinese frontier and enter the district of Blagoveshchensk, coinciding with the time of the occupation of Iman.

(h) The units of Lieut. Gen. Baron Ungern-Sternberg are to be utilized for disorganizing the rear of the Reds and acting in small partisan units in accordance with the previously arranged plan within the districts. (Misovaya-Selenga-Petrovsky Zavod.)

2. As the Russian forces advance and occupy Iman-Khabarovsk, units of Japanese expeditionary forces, without taking an active part in the struggle with the bolsheviks, temporarily occupy the regions freed from the Reds, giving aid to the expenditionary detachments in their struggle with the bolshevist partisan movement.

3. Upon the liberation of the maritime district, the Japanese forces immediately evacuate from the places temporarily occupied by them to the cities of Nikolsk-Usurisk and Vladivostok, and do not advance beyond the 30 verst line (as foreseen in the Russo-Japanese treaty of Apr. 29, 1920).

4. At the time of the beginning of the offensive of the Russian forces the Japanese command gives them material aid amounting to 500,000 yen and gives for use by the Russian command the following arms and munitions: Three thousand two hundred rifles of various types, 350,000 cartridges to match the rifles, 24 machine guns of various types, 24 cases of cartridges to match them, 6 field and 2 mountain 3-inch cannon, and 75 cases of shells for them. The number of arms and munitions may be increased in case of necessity.

5. The Japanese command temporarily undertakes to supply the Russian forces with all necessary food and fodder and adopts measures to transport equipment and clothing from Tsindao and the railroad zone of the Chinese Eastern Railroad at Grodekovo.

6. After the occupation of Khabarovsk the Japanese command enters a plea with the Japanese Imperial Government that the contraband be removed from the moneys deposited by Lieut. Gen. Ataman Semenov in the Yokohama specie bank and that these moneys be transferred to the Russian command.

7. The Japanese command aids in transporting Russian troops by sea to the northern coast and arms Russian ships which are guarding the coast as fully as possible.

8. The Japanese command at the time of the occupation of Iman, at its own discretion, will land troops for the protection of the Japanese fishing schooners in the bays of St. Vladimir, Tetiukha, Terneye, and the Imperatorsky port.

9. Until permanent order is established in the Far East, the Japanese command takes upon itself the guarding of the port and of the fortress of Vladivostok and maintains a control of the lines of the Ussuri and the Chinese Eastern Railroad.

10. After the occupation of Khabarovsk and the clearing of the country from the communist government of the Far Eastern Republic, the commander in chief of all the armed forces and the campaign Ataman of all the Cossack forces of the Russian eastern borderland, Lieut. Gen. Ataman Semenov, temporarily, until the convocation of the territorial people's assembly, assumes the full power of civil authority on the territory of the Far East.

11. After the clearing of the Maritime, Sakhalin, Kamchatka, Amur, and Transbaikal Provinces and the overthrow of the rule of the Far Eastern Republic, elections take place immediately for the territorial people's assembly, with the purpose of establishing a democratic rule in the Far East.

12. When a stable governmental authority is established in the Far East, Japanese subjects shall receive preferential rights for obtaining hunting, fishing, and forestry concessions in the Maritime, Sakhalin, and Kamchatka Provinces, and for the development of the mining resources and gold mines in the Maritime and Amur Provinces.

13. Paragraph 12 of this treaty, in case of necessity, may be reconsidered and supplemented.

14. The above treaty goes into effect from the day of its signing by both sides.

(Signed) LIEUT. GEN. SAVELIEV,
Acting Commander in Chief of all the Armed Forces and Acting Campaign Ataman of all the Cossack Forces of the Russian Eastern Borderland, Commander of the Grodekovo Military Unit.

(Signed) SOBOLEV,
Chief of Staff of the Grodekovo Military Unit, Major General of the General Staff.

(Seal of the staff of the Grodekovo military unit.)

Then follow the signatures and seals of the Japanese parties to the treaty in Japanese.

This is a true copy of the original.

But here again the Japanese encountered the heroism and the stubbornness of the Russian population of the Far East. The bands of Ungern, after they entered the territory of the Far Eastern Republic and Soviet Russia, were dispersed by the troops of these two countries, and Ungern himself was executed; the bands of Sychev were unsuccessful, and finally, under the pressure of the Far Eastern Republic, were disarmed by the Chinese and dispersed; Semenov, having encountered opposition even among his own men, was forced to go abroad and the plan failed. The troops of the Far Eastern Republic, on the territory cleared by the Japanese, were all the time guarding the people's interests and the liberties which had been conquered at such a high cost and were ready to fight to the very end against Semenov's "democrats."

That the Japanese, in their policy in the Far Eastern Republic, did not stop at anything is shown by the document inserted below, which, like the above-mentioned Japanese-Semenov treaty, is in the hands of the Government of the Far Eastern Republic. (Offer of a Chinese Khun-Khus to the Japanese:)

We have at our disposal detachments in Nikolsk, at the eighty-ninth junction and at the junction Dubinskoye. If you send to my address 4,000 yen and 500 poods (1 pood equals 36 pounds) flour, 100 poods choomiza, 1,200 pairs of shoes, my detachments may be at your disposal on July 25, 1921.

GEN. KUANKUASIN.

On the document is written:

Agreed.

Staff of the Eleventh Division, July 15, 1921.

The Japanese failure gave to the population of the Far East an opportunity to continue its work of strengthening the young State. On February 12 the constituent assembly of the Far Eastern Republic was opened, and it immediately set about the important task of the drafting of the constitution of the Republic. This important work was finished on April 27, 1921. The constituent assembly, after finishing the work of building up the Republic, appealed to all those on whom depends the future peace not only on the Russian Far East but also of the entire Far East; to all former and present participants of the intervention, pointing out the collective responsibility of all of them for all the horrors suffered by the population during the Japanese intervention, which is still in operation. It could not help pointing out that the population, which had beheld in the solemn declaration of the United States of America an assurance that the Japanese had come with their armies on the invitation of that Government, can not help considering the American Government as primarily responsible for the misfortunes of the Russian Far East.

The constituent assembly appealed separately to the Japanese Government, proposing that it withdraw its troops and finally enter into normal political and economic relations on the basis of equal rights of both parties. But Japan remained silent and continued its adventure in the maritime Province.

XLVI.

All appeals of the government of the Far Eastern Republic remained unanswered, and only after President Harding had addressed the powers with reference to the Washington conference, at which inevitably the far eastern policy of Japan—in China and Siberia—would be discussed, did the Japanese inform the government of the Far Eastern Republic of their consent and willingness to start negotiations with it. Thus the Dairen conference was started on August 26. The delegation of the government of the Far Eastern Republic was immediately placed in a difficult position, as it was deprived of the possibility of safely communicating with its government; its couriers were held up in Manchuria, and its telegrams arrived in a mutilated condition. Great efforts had to be made to obtain even a modicum of opportunity to communicate.

The Japanese were not in a hurry and were protracting the negotiations, as they were unwilling to discuss the question of the evacuation of their troops. They completely refused to discuss the question of Sakhalin and the lower course of the Amur River, declaring that they could not discuss this matter with the Far Eastern Republic. They would discuss it with the recognized All-Russian Government. At the same time they insisted upon the revision, jointly with the Far Eastern Republic, of the fisheries convention of 1907 which was concluded between Japan and the Tsar's Government. Thus, in one case, when it was not convenient for the Japanese, the Far Eastern Republic was declared not competent to discuss questions referring to its territory, while in other cases, when this was necessary to the Japanese, it was recognized as qualified to do so. The causes of this inconsistency are too clear to require pointing out. The conference remained without results and soon it became known what the Japanese were after. In its official declaration the Japanese Government emphasized that it wanted only guaranties for the life and the property of its citizens and the "equalizing" of the Japanese with the Russians as to their rights in the territory of the Far Eastern Republic. But in practice these demands meant something quite different. While the Russian peasants, according to the constitution—this was also the case at the time of Tsar—could only lease their land for a long or a short term, the Japanese wanted the right of owning the land as property. This privilege is what the Japanese call "equal" rights with the Russian population. But in one case the Japanese really demanded "equal rights," namely, with regard to the navigation rights under the Japanese flag on the Amur River and as to fishing in the bights and interior rivers—to which rights they are not entitled according to the agreements concluded, first, between Tsarist Russia and China, and, second, between Tsarist Russia and Japan. Having received this "equalization," the Japanese would de facto be not the equals but the masters in the Russian Far East.

Very ominous was and still is the desire of the Japanese to destroy the long-abandoned fortress of Vladivostok, with whose condition the Japanese are sufficiently familiar, as well as their insistence that the government of the Far Eastern Republic should not fortify the shores of the Pacific Ocean. Of a similar nature also was the attempt to obtain the consent of the government of the Far Eastern Republic to a "temporary" establishment of Japanese troops on the territory of the Far Eastern Republic whenever the Japanese Government should deem this necessary.

All this is a clear indication of the future intentions of Japan with reference to the Russian Far East. As to the economic aspects of the matter, the Japanese Government declared not so long ago that it only wants equality of opportunity for itself and other foreigners to take part in the commercial and industrial life of the Far Eastern Republic, and that in this sense it insists that the government of the Far Eastern Republic should recognize all the rights which were acquired by Japanese citizens from former Russian Governments. But this demand which at the first glance seems quite innocent means for the Japanese something quite different, which they do not care to speak out loudly. By Russian Governments they understand the "governments" of Semenov and Merkulov, created by the Japanese and imposed upon the Russian population with the help of Japanese bayonets. With them the Japanese concluded and are concluding secret treaties (one of them has already been quoted above) concerning concessions and various exclusive privileges and rights. The population of the Far Eastern Republic considers these "governments" as common criminals, who are pillaging and selling out the property of the people and ought to be indicted before the courts of the Republic.

The indignation which such a request on the part of Japan arouses among the Russian population is therefore quite natural.

No wonder the Japanese and Russian delegates have been deliberating for four months in Dairen without obtaining any results.

The Dairen conference was necessary for the Japanese in order that they might be able to say in Washington that all the questions connected with the "evacuation" of the Japanese troops from Siberia are being solved by them jointly with the Russians, thus diverting the attention of the participants in the conference. After the conference they hope to have a free hand. Simultaneously with the negotiations in Dairen, the Japanese are giving instructions to their troops in Vladivostok to support and to defend with Japanese bayonets the so-called provisional government of Merkulov. Of this the following secret Japanese telegram is sufficient evidence:

TOKYO, September 26.

RADIO GENERAL STAFF, Vladivostok.

In case of disorders the strictest neutrality is to be observed. The provisional government is to be defended, if necessary by force. All overtures on the part of the Far Eastern Republic referring to the occupation of Nikolsk-Usurisk and Vladivostok are to be declined diplomatically, and if this will not help, also by force. An official communication with the Russian Government in this request is not necessary.

MINISTER OF WAR.

In order to exert pressure upon the Government of the Far Eastern Republic, and in order to broaden the sphere of their influence, the Japanese, in December, 1921, again resorted to their old and tried method: They organized the last remainders of the army of Semenov, Kolchak (the so-called Kappel men), and some parts of the army of Denikin and Wrangel who had come to Vladivostok, directing them through the neutral zone toward Khabarovsk, thus attempting to cut off an enormous territory—the entire shore of the Pacific Ocean—from the Far Eastern Republic. In organizing this attack, in arming troops and providing them with money, the Japanese are again violating the agreements which they themselves imposed upon the Vladivostok Zemstvo government, according to which (1) no Russian troops could stay within the zone where the Japanese troops are stationed; (2) neither the Russian troops from the direction of Iman nor the Japanese troops from the direction of Station Yevgenyevka (the farthest point to the north where Japanese troops were stationed) could enter the neutral zone.

The Japanese always remain true to themselves and to their "frank" policy.

This attitude of the Japanese compelled the National Assembly in Chita to make a vigorous protest on December 9, 1921.

XLVII.

By the "agreement" with China, of August, 1918, the Japanese received the legal right to fix themselves for a long time on the Chinese Eastern Railway, to establish themselves there so that in the future it would be easier for them to swallow also this piece of Chinese territory on which Tsarist Russia had gained so firm a hold. All the further Japanese intrigues of the last few years—as is apparent from Semenov's order, by the way—were exclusively directed toward the creation of a proper situation to "justify" them in seizing a new opportunity for a prolonged protection of this railroad. The complicity of the Japanese in the attacks of the Khun-Khuses on the Eastern Chinese Railroad is no secret for anyone in the Far East. The Japanese need proofs that the Chinese are unable to protect the railroad and that such protection must therefore be effected by the Japanese or, at least, by the "Russian" Semenov men who are in their service. France, which claims her own interest in the Chinese Eastern Railway through the Russian-Asiatic Bank, is not disinclined to help the Japanese, whenever that is possible, in this intrigue, by supporting the Japanese point of view.

The Japanese have taken pains to create for themselves a favorable situation in southern Manchuria, and now they have been greatly strengthened in northern Manchuria, too. With the help of the Chinese reactionaries in Manchuria, the influence of the Japanese grows; this is also the center of the intrigues of the Russian counter-revolutionists, who are paid in Japanese coin for their services. Harbin and Manchuria were the centers of the activities of Horvath, Semenov, Kalmykov, and many others. Hailar subsequently became the base for Baron Ungern, who was operating in Mongolia, and Hailar became a refuge for them when they had to flee before the troops of the Far Eastern Republic and soviet Russia. Through the Chinese Eastern Railway, Semenov's men, against the will of the Maritime government, entered the Maritime Province.

Thus the Chinese Eastern Railway, which so long was the object of Japanese aspirations, has finally come into their hands. The secret Japanese telegrams quoted below, the first of September 12, from Tokyo, and the second, the reply thereto, of September 27, from Harbin, are a very good illustration of the Japanese intentions:

TOKYO, September 12 (radio).

To the GENERAL STAFF, Vladivostok.
(k/t confidential):

Your army should be ready for the occupation of the Chinese Eastern Railway. The plan of occupation will be delivered to you (in writing). The occupation will have a temporary and demonstrative character. We are waiting for particulars from Dairen.

MINISTRY OF WAR.

HARBIN, September 27.

Gen. TACHIBANA, Vladisvostok
(Delivered by courier):

After considering the situation concerning the demonstrative occupation of the Chinese Eastern Railway, I beg to inform you as follows:

A demonstrative occupation would be a mistake on our part, because we would not have a sufficient cause for it. A full agreement with the important Russian groups in Harbin has not been reached; the influential personalities have rejected our proposal. They consider it inopportune to address their request directly to the Japanese Government; they are still pretending to be good patriots. For my part I consider the occupation as premature, aside from the fact that I do not expect any results from the Dairen conference. The occupation might have an undesirable effect upon the Far Eastern Republic and give away our future plans. For the time being we must not cast off our rôle as benevolent friends of the Russians.

Concerning this question I have sent my written report by courier to Tokyo.

TAKAYAMA.

WHAT NOW?

The whole history of Japanese intervention in the Russian Far East from the first day up to the present has undoubtedly proved that there is a determined plan of Japan to bring about, with the consent and the approval of France, a masked annexation of the entire Far East, or at least of portions of it. This history also establishes the fact that the Japanese, under the influence of the international situation, have frequently changed their plans—now reducing the territory of the intended annexation, now increasing it, now suddenly preparing "Russian" forces, which they send forth at the necessary moment. At present there is in the hands of the Japanese the southern part of the Maritime Province, which they are trying to enlarge through the so-called "governments" which they are imposing there; they are in complete possession of Sakhalin and the lower course of the Amur, which is invaluable in economic as well as in strategic respects; they are the masters of the whole Pacific coast.

In a peaceful way Japan will return the seized territories only under the pressure of those who so often have forced them to change their plans and to alter their course. But will they force Japan to stop this dangerous game? On the answer to this question very much depends, especially the future peace of the Far East. The fact that, under the influence of the Washington conference, the Japanese have started negotiations with the Far Eastern Republic in Dairen is a confirmation of the conclusion at which we have arrived—the pressure on Japan must be brought to bear from without. This is also confirmed by the fact that the Japanese, uncertain as to the results of the Washington conference, are so greatly protracting the negotiations in the Far East, and are unwilling to give a definite reply as to the central question—that of the unconditional evacuation of their troops.

The Washington conference, and, in general, its participants outside of the conference, all those who have taken part in the intervention in the Far East ought, in their own interest, i. e., in the interest of the peace in the Far East, which means also the peace of the whole world, to liberate the Russian population of the Far East finally from this terrible and unequal struggle, which it has been conducting for three years in the defense of its rights and its dignity.

The Russian people are waiting for the answer to the question: What now?

On this answer depends the future peace in the Russian Far East.

APPENDIX.

DOCUMENTS REFERRING TO THE HISTORY OF JAPANESE INTERVENTION.

A DECLARATION OF THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT.

The Japanese Government, actuated by sentiments of sincere friendship toward the Russian people, has always entertained the most sanguine hopes for the speedy reestablishment of order in Russia and a healthy and untrammeled development of her national life. Abundant proof, however, is now afforded to show that the Central European Empires, taking advantage of the chaotic and defenseless condition in which Russia has momentarily been placed, are consolidating their hold on that country and are steadily extending their activities to the Russian far eastern possessions. They have persistently interfered with the passage of the Czecho-Slovak troops through Russia. In the forces now opposing these valiant troops, the Germans and Austro-Hungarian prisoners are freely enlisted, and they practically assume commanding position.

The Czecho-Slovak troops, aspiring to secure a free and independent existence for their race and loyally espousing the common cause of the Allies, justly command every sympathy and consideration from the cobelligerents, to whom their destiny is a matter of deep and abiding concern. In the presence of the threatening danger to which the Czecho-Slovak troops are actually exposed in Siberia at the hands of the Germans and Austro-Hungarians, the Allies have naturally felt themselves unable to view with indifference the course of events, and a certain number of their troops have already been ordered to proceed to Vladivostok. The Government of the United States, equally sensible of the gravity of the situation, recently approached the Japanese Government with proposals for an early dispatch of troops to relieve the pressure now weighing upon the Czecho-Slovak troops.

The Japanese Government, being anxious to fall in with the desire of the American Government, and also to act in harmony with their allies in this expedition, has decided to proceed at once to the disposition of suitable forces for the proposed mission. A certain number of troops will be sent forthwith to Vladivostok. In adopting this course, the Japanese Government remains unshaken in its constant desire to promote relations of enduring friendship with Russia and the Russian people, and it reaffirms its avowed policy of respecting the territorial integrity of Russia and of abstaining from all interference in her internal politics. It further declares that upon the realization of the objects mentioned it will immediately withdraw all Japanese troops from Russian territory.

DECLARATION OF THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT.

[Cable.]

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
August 5, 1918.

Flag Brooklyn, Vladivostok, Siberia:

The following is an official statement to the press on the American-Japanese action in Siberia: "In the judgment of the Government of the United States, a judgment arrived at after repeated and very searching considerations of the whole situation, military intervention in Russia would be more likely to add to the present sad confusion there than to cure it and would injure Russia rather than help her out of her distress. Such military intervention as has been most frequently proposed, even supposing it to be efficacious in its immediate object of delivering an attack upon Germany from the east, would, in its judgment, be more likely to turn out to be merely a method of making use of Russia than to be a method of serving her. Her people if they profited by it at all could not profit by it in time to deliver them from their present desperate difficulties, and their substance would meantime be used to maintain foreign armies, not to reconstitute their own, or to feed their own men, women, and children. We are bending all our energies now to the purpose of winning on the western front, and it would, in the judgment of the Government of the United States, be most unwise to divide or dissipate our forces. As the Government of the United States sees the present circumstances, therefore, military action is admissible in Russia now only to render such protection and help as is possible to the Czecho-Slovaks against the armed Austrian and German prisoners who are attacking them and to steady any efforts at self-government or self-defense in which the Russians themselves may be willing to accept assistance.

"Whether from Vladivostok or from Murmansk and Archangel, the only present object for which American troops will be employed will be to guard military stores which may subsequently be needed by Russian forces in the organization of their own self-defense. With such object in view the Government of the United States is now cooperating with the Governments of France and Great Britain in the neighborhood of Murmansk and Archangel. The United States and Japan are the only powers which are just now in position to act in Siberia in sufficient force to accomplish even such modest objects as those that have been outlined. The Government of the United States has therefore proposed to the Government of Japan that each of the two Governments send a force of a few thousand men to Vladivostok, with the purpose of cooperating as a single force in the occupation of Vladivostok and in safeguarding so far as it may the country to the rear of the westward-moving Czecho-Slovaks, and the Japanese Government has consented. In taking this action the Government of the United States wishes to announce to the people of Russia in the most public and solemn manner that it contemplates no interference with the political sovereignty of Russia, no intervention in her internal affairs, not even in the local affairs, of the limited areas which her military force may be obliged to occupy, and no impairment of Russian territorial integrity, either now or hereafter; but that what we are about to do has as its single and only object the rendering of such aid as shall be acceptable to the Russian people themselves in their endeavors to regain control of their own affairs, their own territory, and their own destiny. The Japanese Government, it is understood, will issue a similar assurance. These plans and purposes of the Government of the United States have been communicated to the Governments of Great Britain, France, and Italy, and those Governments have advised the Department of State that they assent to them in principle. No conclusion that the Government of the United States has arrived at in this important matter is intended, however, as an effort to restrict the actions or interfere with the independent judgment of the Governments with which we are now associated in the war. It is also the hope and purpose of the Government of the United States to take advantage of the earliest opportunity to send to Siberia a commission of merchants, agricultural experts, labor advisers, Red Cross representatives, and agents of the Young Men's Christian Association, accustomed to organizing the best methods of spreading useful information and rendering educational help of a modest kind in order in some sympathetic way to relieve the immediate economic necessities of the people there in every way for which an opportunity may open. The execution of this plan will not be permitted to embarrass the military assistance rendered to the Czecho-Slovaks. It is the hope and expectation of the Government of the United States that the Governments with which it is associated will, whenever necessary or possible, lend their active aid in the execution of these military and economic plans."

ACTING SECRETARY OF DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

APPEAL OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT TO THE PEOPLES OF RUSSIA.

Your allies have not forgotten you. We remember all the services your heroic army rendered us in the early years of the war. We are coming as friends to help you save yourselves from dismemberment and destruction at the hands of Germany, which is trying to enslave your people and use the great resources of your country to its own ends.

We wish to solemnly assure you that while our troops are entering Russia to assist you in your struggle against Germany we shall not retain one foot of your territory. We deplore the civil war that divides you and the internal dissensions that facilitate Germany's plans of conquest, but we have no intention to impose any political system upon Russia.

The destinies of Russia are in the hands of the Russian peoples. It is for them, and for them alone, to decide their form of government and to find a solution for their social problems.

Peoples of Russia, your very existence as an independent nation is at stake. The liberties you have won in the revolution are threatened with extinction by the iron hand of Germany. Rally around the banner of freedom and independence that we, who are still your allies, are raising in your midst, and secure the triumph of those two great principles without which there can be no lasting peace or real liberty for the world. Peoples of Russia, we want not only to stop the German aggression but intend also to bring economic relief to your devastated and suffering country. We have already forwarded supplies to you and will do likewise in the future.

We wish to aid in the development of the industrial and natural resources of your country, not with a view to exploiting them for our own benefit. We desire, too, to restore the exchange of commodities, to stimulate agriculture, and to enable you to take your rightful place among the free nations of the world.

Peoples of Russia, join us in the defense of your liberties. Our one desire is to see Russia strong and free, and then retire to watch the Russian people work out their own destinies.

NOTE OF THE MARITIME PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT TO THE JAPANESE DIPLOMATIC MISSION.

A note handed by the provisional government of the maritime privincial Zemstvo to the counsellor of the Japanese diplomatic mission in Siberia, Mr. Matsudaira, for transmission to the Japanese Imperial Government:

MARCH 2, 1920.

On January 31, 1920, at the time of the complete downfall of the government of Admiral Kolchak, under the stress of civil war and at a time when Russia's allies in the war with Germany (1914–1918) were exercising a guardianship over Russia that was humiliating to the Russian national feelings, and were intervening in Russia's internal affairs—the Maritime Provincial Zemstvo, which is the people's government recognized by all classes of the population without exception, assumed the power and is now the only government in the territory of the Maritime Province. It is entirely responsible for the preservation of peace and order, as well as for the defense of the national honor and the sovereign rights of an undivided and free Russia. The provisional government, aiming to fulfill its great obligations to defend the sovereign rights of the Russians in the Far East, is seeking peaceful ways for ending the insulting intervention of foreigners in the internal affairs of Russia in the Far East, so that peace and order may be established in place of the prevailing anarchy and civil war.

With the ending of the military operations of the Allies against Germany a fundamental change occurred in the aims and purposes of the intervention, and the only formal pretext put forth for the continuation of such intervention at the present time is the necessity of guarding the railroads necessary for the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak detachments. Now, when the normal process of internal governmental construction has begun the provisional government has all the means to secure the immediate and orderly evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak troops, and when it is evident to all that the process of national unification is taking place, the immediate cessation of foreign intervention in Russia's affairs is demanded, both by the expressed will of the people and by changed conditions.

The provisional government of the Maritime Provincial Zemstvo declares with deep regret that not all the participants in the coalition of powers concerned in the intervention realize sufficiently that conditions have changed so that there can no longer be any justification for permitting their armies to remain in eastern Siberia and in the Provinces of the Far East.

Thus at the time when the troops of some of the participants in the intervention are being withdrawn, or, according to declaration made, are getting ready for evacuation, the Japanese Government is increasing the number of its troops of occupation in the Russian Far East. The fact above mentioned establishes the responsibility of the Japanese Government for the continuation and even for the increase of intervention, which has now assumed the character of a one-power attempt to influence by force the will of the people and the internal policy of Russia in the Far East.

The provisional government of the Maritime Provincial Zemstvo publicly and firmly declares:

1. That it considers any further intervention by the Japanese Government a violation of the sovereign rights of Russia in the Far East.

2. That the official reasons given for the retention of Japanese troops in the Far East, and especially for increasing them by the arrival of fresh troops in Vladivostok, are contradictory to the principles of higher justice.

3. That the intervention of the Japanese Government has thus far been used for lending active support to the reactionary and irresponsible government of Kolchak, and that until the present time this intervention has been lending voluntary or involuntary support to the lawless acts and the innumerable atrocities committed by Semenov in Chita and by Kalmykov in Khabarovsk, the latter having recently been defeated by the revolutionary troops.

4. The interference of the commanders of the Japanese military forces in the activity of Russian authorities has reached such a state that criminals are granted an asylum by the Japanese, and that the Japanese refuse to surrender them to the authorities; for example. the case of Gen. Rozanov.

5. That the Japanese troops, because of the abnormal conditions of intervention, are shooting Russian citizens, burning down villages, etc.

6. That all the above stated facts prevent the accomplishment of the great work of national unification of the Russian people and the formation of a government in accordance with the desires of the Russian people at the present time.

In view of the facts stated above, the provisional government of the Maritime Provincial Zemstvo, expressing the unanimous wishes of the people and firmly believing that, with the exception of a small group of irresponsible individuals who are guided by selfish motives, the entire population of free Russia is opposed to intervention, and that it is the sincere desire of the Japanese people that their sons return home, resolves to request you to transmit to the Imperial Japanese Government the intimation that in order to maintain friendly relations with the Japanese people it is necessary: (1) To complete the evacuation of the Amur Province, which has begun and which is welcomed by the population, and (2) to immediately proceed with a complete and steady withdrawal of Japanese troops from the territory of the Russian Far East.

Sincerely aiming to maintain friendly relations with the Japanese people, the provisional government of the Maritime Provincial Zemstvo expresses the hope that you will, without any delay, bring this solution to the knowledge of the Imperial Japanese Government and give all possible aid to the favorable solution of this problem. On its part the provisional government will use all efforts to have the population of the Maritime Province maintain the necessary order and abstain from all irresponsible actions while the Japanese troops are being withdrawn from Russian territory.

The above note is being transmitted to the diplomatic representatives of foreign powers in the Far East for the information of their Governments.

NOTE OF THE MARITIME PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT TO THE REPRESENTATIVE OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA.

MARCH 8, 1920.

Up to the present time the provisional government of the Maritime Provincial Zemstvo has taken all necessary measures for the security and unobstructed movement of the Czecho-Slovak forces. No complaints have been received by the provisional government which would indicate any exceptional difficulties thrown in the way of the departing troops or any necessity for outside aid.

At the same time, however, the Japanese Government has issued a declaration that the presence, and even the increase in the number, of Japanese troops is due principally to the necessity of assuring the safety and the unobstructed movement of the Czecho-Slovak detachments.

The Provisional Government, representing the unanimous will of the entire population and enjoying its full support, expresses its readiness to give all possible help, with all the means at its disposal—technical as well as military—in accomplishing the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak forces; and requests you please to inform it whether the successful accomplishment of the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak troops really depends on the presence and the constant increase of the Japanese troops on the territory of the Far Eastern borderland, in spite of all the necessary measures taken by the Provisional Government.

THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF THE MARITIME PROVINCIAL ZEMSTVO,
A. MEDVEDIEV,
President of the Maritime Provincial Zemstvo and Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs.

REPLY OF THE CZECHO-SLOVAK REPRESENTATIVE.

On March 8, 1920, the Provisional Government of the Maritime Provincial Zemstvo (in Vladivostok) addressed an official inquiry to the diplomatic representative of the Czecho-Slovak Republic in Siberia, asking: "Is it true that the successful carrying out of the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak forces, in spite of all the necessary measures adopted by the Provisional Government, depends on the presence and the constant increase of the Japanese forces on the territory of the Far Eastern borderland?"

The following reply was received on March 10, 1920, to this inquiry:

The first obstacles which were created in the process of evacuation of our forces by the soviet authority in the district west of Irkutsk were removed by an agreement between the Czecho-Slovaks and the soviet forces and from that moment on the evacuation of our forces has not met with any difficulties on the part of the soviet authorities.

On the Transbaikal Railroad the protection of the roadway was intrusted to the Japanese forces, and during the entire time there was no destruction of the railroad line, in spite of the orders issued by Ataman Semenov to destroy bridges and tunnels in order to interfere with our evacuation. This section of the railroad was in the sphere of influence of Ataman Semenov.

As to the Far East, I must certify with a feeling of deep gratitude and sincere friendship that on the part of the Provisional Government and all its institutions the evacuation of our forces not only did not meet with any obstacles, but, on the contrary, it was always given every possible assistance, for which I consider it my duty to express to the Provisional Government and its institutions my deepest gratitude.

Plenipotentiary Minister of the Czecho-Slovak Republic.

MEMORANDUM OF THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT TO THE INTERALLIED DIPLOMATIC CONFERENCE.

On the night of the 5th of April, without any provocation on the part of the Russian military or civil authorities and without any previous communication with the Russian authorities, the Japanese troops in Vladivostok forcibly disarmed and relieved the Russian guard in the Government institutions of the city of Vladivostok, replacing it with their own guard, have hoisted the Japanese flag over the buildings, have fired at some of these structures, including the building occupied by the Provisional Government, which was seriously damaged and the records and property largely destroyed, have forcibly disarmed some of the Russian detachments of the Vladivostok garrison, and have arrested Mr. A. A. Menshikov, a member of the Provisional Government and several military and civil government officials.

This sudden attack of the Japanese troops, which has been accompanied in some cases by destruction of human lives, comes as a surprise to the Provisional Government, the more since it occurred just at the time when negotiations were going on between the Japanese and Russian military authorities, these negotiations having been started at the request of the Japanese authorities, for the establishment of friendly mutual relations, and when the Russian military authorities, in accordance with the instructions of the Provisional Government, have expressed their readiness to settle peacefully all matters which may come up in connection with the presence of the Japanese troops in Russian territory.

In the declaration to the population, made by the chief of the Japanese forces in Siberia, Gen. Oi, and in the statement issued by Capt. Nakasova, the Japanese command explaining its activities, which have been contrary to the declarations of the Japanese Government addressed to the Russian people, and in conflict with the interallied agreement, alleges that the Russian military detachments have fired at the Japanese guard at different places.

The provisional government categorically denies this statement. The Russian detachments have been instructed fully to respect all the allied military forces in Vladivostok. The discipline of the Russian troops and the fact of their realizing the responsibility they have before the country are well known to the allied command. Nevertheless, the provisional government, though aware of the justice of its assurances, is willing to put the incident before an interallied commission of inquiry.

Strongly protesting against the activity of the Japanese command, the provisional government addresses this protest to all the Allies, as the so-called "intervention" has been undertaken by all the Allies conjointly and the responsibility for the recent affairs lies with all the Allies.

With a view to preventing the further development of events of this nature, with all the possible consequences thereof, the provisional government requests of the interallied diplomatic conference to propose to the Japanese command:

1. To release immediately the members of the provisional government, the civil and military officials and other Russian citizens who were arrested by the Japanese command in connection with the recent events.

2. To evacuate immediately all the Government buildings occupied by the Japanese troops and to hand them over to the Russian authorities in good order.

3. To give a satisfactory explanation and apologize to the provisional government because of the activities of the Japanese forces.

4. To make no searches and to permit no other persons under its protection to make searches or arrests without the permission of the provisional government.

5. To return the arms immediately to the three Russian military detachments from whom they were forcibly seized, and also to appoint an interallied commission, with the participation of Japanese and Russians, for a detailed and impartial investigation of the causes and circumstances under which these events occurred.

The provisional government considers it its duty to declare that respect for the sovereign rights of the Russian State and of the authority of the provisional government of the Far East is an indispensable condition for disposing of this incident, and that only the adoption of all the necessary measures will enable the provisional government to pacify the irritated population of the Province, and to take measures for a peaceful settlement of the affair.

The provisional government at the same time begs the representatives of the allied countries to inform their Governments of the aforesaid.

NOTE OF THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT TO THE DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVE OF JAPAN.

Having the support and confidence of all classes of the population, as seen from the numerous resolutions passed by the trade-unions, by the conferences of the employees in the Government and public institutions in the Province, by the political parties, etc., and especially being in very successful cooperation with the Government—the provisional government of the Russian Far East—the Maritime Province Zemstvo Board, has been directing its domestic policy to the establishment of justice, freedom, order, and equality, and in its foreign relations has endeavored to maintain the Russian sovereignty in the Russian Far East and to develop peaceful and friendly relations with other nations in accordance with the principles of international relations. Therefore, the provisional government—the Maritime Province Zemstvo Board—has with regard to all attacks and activities been guided by the principles of justice in spite of many outside unfavorable circumstances, and now declares before the whole world that it has not provoked by its activities the attack on Vladivostok by the Japanese command on the historic night of April 5.

The sudden and illegal attack of the Japanese troops came as a sad surprise to the provisional government at the very moment when, with a view to strengthening the mutual friendly relations, it had expressed its readiness to discuss peacefully the maximum of concessions to the Japanese command, on condition that the sovereign rights of the peoples and all the obligations the government had undertaken with the Allies, Russia, and the world, would be respected.

For the protection of the sovereign rights, the freedom, and the national property of the people and the authority vested in the government by the people the government, guided by its rights to independence and self-protection, must have sufficient strength and power. This force must come from out of the people and must be selected by the government, which is acting on behalf of the people. Only a Russian army can constitute such a force, not an army of aggression, but for the protection of the country from any attempts at a forcible coup from whatever side it may be initiated.

The provisional government is able and determined to maintain its authority over the said territory by adopting every measure. The absence of the people's army as a force upon which the government could rely would create anarchy and disorder, from which not only the Russian citizens will suffer but also the foreigners in the Far East who in one way or another have common interests with Russia. Japan as a civilized nation can not desire such anarchy, and, on the other hand, can not prevent it if it aims at intrusting the protection of the Russian State interests to foreign, not to Russian, forces or to reactionary forces hostile to the people. Only the enemies of Russia, who want to see Russia crushed, can aim at that; but Japan is not Russia's enemy, and the Russians on their part look for help and friendly support from the Japanese people. The government, therefore, is even now ready to put as a foundation for coming negotiations with Japan the principle of friendly mutual support on economic and political lines.

In order to realize these aims and to prevent the repetition of such sad events, which we believe are not in agreement with the general policy of Japan in her dealings with Russia, and in order to reestablish relations in accordance with the principles of justice and international custom, the government considers it its duty and feels justified in proposing the following conditions:

1. In order to prove that the recent events have not been directed against the government recognized by the people, the Japanese command must correct its error and release all military and civil officials and others who have been willfully arrested by the Japanese command. Having interfered with functions of the Russian territorial authorities, the Japanese command must consider it its duty to comply with this lawful request.

2. The government institutions occupied by the Japanese troops must be evacuated and restored in good order to the proper Russian authorities, together with all the documents and property therein.

3. The government and the people, indignant at the recent events, expect that after satisfactory explanations have been given the Japanese command will apologize to the government and will assure it that such sad occurrences will not be repeated.

4. The provisional government can not agree that the temporary disarming of all the Russian military detachments and the militia should become a permanent fact. Japan has not been authorized by the Allies to act in such a manner, nor has the disarming been undertaken at the request of the Japanese Imperial Government. It has been an independent and illegal act on the part of the Japanese command. The arms which were taken away from the Russian military detachments must be returned to them as a proof of the sincerity of the Japanese declarations of their noninterference in the domestic affairs of the Russian Far East, of their desire to evacuate their troops, leaving Russia to the Russians.

5. The Japanese authorities shall not effect searches or allow searches to be effected under their protection by irresponsible persons, having the full assurance of the government that the Russian authorities, relying upon their disciplined detachments, are in a position to maintain order and protect the lives of all citizens without exception.

The provisional government of the Russian Far East undertakes this step, recognizing its duties and responsibilities to the people, and especially because all the classes of the population, indignant at the recent events, have the right to demand from the government the adoption of every measure necessary to reach the aforementioned results.

The events of April 4–5, which have not been provoked by anyone, will shock the public opinion of the entire civilized world, and the Japanese Government no doubt will not consider as legal the action of the local command, and will do everything possible to amend these fatal blunders.

The provisional government, not assuming any responsibility for the further development of events, hopes that the Japanese Government will reach a wise decision in the matter.

DECLARATION OF GEN. OI REGARDING THE EVENTS OF APRIL 4–5, 1920.

CITIZENS:

On the basis of the declaration made public by the Japanese command on March 31, 1920, the Japanese command, beginning with April 2, has been carrying on negotiations with the representatives of the Russian authorities regarding a peaceful settlement of the question of the stay of Japanese troops in the district.

Suddenly, on the night of April 4, armed Russian troops attacked our warehouses, garages, and military prisons, and also fired at our patrols in various parts of the city.

In view of the above illegal actions and in order to prevent a threatening danger from the armed Russian military units, the Japanese command is compelled to demand that the Russian military units be disarmed.

Without having any personal aims in this matter, the Japanese command can not allow any further development of disorder and will take the necessary measures after negotiations with the Russian authorities.

Gen. OI,
The Commander of the Japanese Forces in Siberia.

RUSSO-JAPANESE AGREEMENT OF APRIL 5, 1920.

(Copy from a copy.)

The terms presented by the commander of the Japanese forces to the provisional government of the Maritime Provincial Zemstvo Board in regard to the declaration made by the Japanese Imperial Government regarding the stay of Japanese troops in the Far East for the purpose of maintaining friendly relations and avoiding conflicts which may arise, judging by the past and present events, between the Japanese troops on the one hand and the Russian authorities and the local population on the other hand.

The representatives of the Russian military forces, after negotiations with the representatives of the Japanese military forces, have expressed their consent to the following terms:

1. To secure the stay of the Japanese troops in the sense of giving them all necessities for such a stay, i. e., quarters, provisions, means of transportation and correspondence, etc.

2. To consider as effective all those decisions concerning military affairs exclusively which were entered into by the Japanese Government or the Japanese command on the one hand and the Russian authorities on the other hand, on the basis of the agreement between the allied powers or the allied command. If these decisions should be found to be not in accordance with the interests of Russia or the Russian Army, the Russian military authorities will make a proposal to reconsider such.

3. Not to arrest and not to interfere with the liberty of individuals who are employed by the Japanese command without bringing this to the knowledge of the command.

4. To liquidate within the limits of the territory of the provisional government all actions and outbreaks, regardless of their source, which threaten the safety of the Japanese troops and also the peace and order of Korea and Manchuria.

5. To restrain all printed articles and individual provocatory actions directly intended to compromise the Japanese troops and the Japanese State.

6. To use all efforts to secure absolutely the life, property, and other rights of Japanese subjects living in the territory.

TEXT OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN RUSSIAN AND JAPANESE COMMANDS OF APRIL 29, 1920.

1. The Russian military command, on the one hand, and the Japanese military command, on the other hand, mutually agree by the issue of simultaneous corresponding orders to immediately end the military operations between the detachments of Russian and Japanese troops in various districts, and the military operations must cease on both sides from the moment the order is received and is mutually exchanged by the commanding officers.

2. The Russian military forces, regardless of the political parties or groups they belong to, must not be located simultaneously with the Japanese troops within the limits of the following districts:

a. Within the limits marked by the line passing within 30 kilometers from the final point occupied by the Japanese troops along the Ussuri Railroad, on the one hand, and the line of the Russo-Chino-Korean frontier from the west and south, on the other hand.

b. Within the line along the Suchan Railroad along the Suchan River from its end, 30 kilometers on each side.

3. The Russian military forces that are at the present time in the above-mentioned districts, within three days after the receipt of this order, are to end military operations, and must be removed from these districts in the above-mentioned three-day period, but this limit may be prolonged by agreement with the local Japanese command.

4. The Russian armed forces which are being withdrawn behind the line of demarcation keep their arms, munitions, and supplies, the quantity being in accordance with the number of the troops on the day the orders are exchanged by the local command, regarding the cessation of military actions, and in accordance with the existing war-time regulations.

The Japanese command will not place any obstacles to the normal supply by the Russian authorities of provisions, supplies, fodder, clothing, and other objects necessary for the existence of Russian troops who have been removed to new quarters.

5. In case of necessity the troops, or portions of them, may be removed from the places where they were originally sent and transported by order of the Russian command to other districts outside the limits of the demarcation line, but without the right to transport them to the Provinces of Transbaikalia and Sakhalin. In case such a removal of Russian forces takes place, they may be moved within the limits of the established 30-kilometer zone, and they may use the Ussuri Railroad on conditions stated in paragraph 4, but only by agreement with the Japanese command regarding the method of transportation.

6. In order to maintain general order and peace and for the performance of militia duty in the districts mentioned in paragraph 2 and along the railroad line, Russian military militia units are permitted, and the personnel, arms, and number of these in each individual district are determined by the Russian authorities with the knowledge of the Japanese command, and must be limited to actual necessary requirements.

The terms regarding the necessary military units for guard duty and military institutions and prison duty in the city of Vladivostok are defined by agreement between the two commands.

7. The guarding of railroads is carried on on the basis of decisions arrived at by the allied military committee in accordance with the decisions of the allied railroad committee regarding the control of railroads.

8. Arms, munitions, and other material necessary for military operations, factories manufacturing such, and warehouses where such are kept, in the districts mentioned in paragraph 2, are subject to seizure by the Japanese command. The future fate of the above-mentioned supplies is subject to special decisions. The following are the exceptions:

a. Arms, munitions, and supplies necessary for militia and prison duty and also necessary for instruction in military schools and maneuvers in the city of Vladivostok in accordance with paragraph 6, are returned from the supplies seized by the Japanese command.

b. The Far Eastern Mechanical and Shipbuilding Works in Vladivostok remain at the disposal of the Russian authorities on condition that no munitions are produced in them and that the Japanese command has the right to supervise the execution of this condition.

c. All objects of military use not mentioned in paragraph 8, which have no direct relation to military operations, and also warehouses containing such, are not subject to seizure.

d. Military supplies used as means of transportation, which have been seized and which are not the absolute property of the Russian authorities, are subject to special registration.

9. The right to dispose of barracks which are at the present time occupied and which may be occupied in the future by the Japanese troops, belongs to the Japanese command until the evacuation. In case of necessity the Japanese command shall furnish to the institutions and military units mentioned in paragraph 6, barracks which are at their disposal within the possible limits.

10. The Russian authorities shall take all measures to protect railroads and telegraph lines in the districts enumerated in paragraph 2, and must use all efforts to reestablish normal communication, and the Japanese command shall give assistance in case of necessity.

11. Both contracting parties must take measures for the speedy realization of this agreement. For this purpose, in case of necessity, and also for the working out of details regarding the execution of this agreement, a special Russo-Japanese commission is established.

12. All the conditions established by the command are of temporary character, and are to be reconsidered at the request of either side, and may be changed by agreement.

DECLARATION OF GEN. OI OF MAY 11, 1920.

Whereas a proposal was recently made to our military command in the name of Mr. Smirnov, representative of the soviet government at Irkutsk, and Mr. Yanson, chief of the foreign affairs committee of the same government, for making, altogether aside from all consideration of a peace treaty, such arrangements between the partisan forces in Siberia and the bolshevik troops, on their eastward advance, and the Japanese Army, as to make it possible to keep each of the aforesaid military forces within their present sphere of operations, and whereas the authorities of the revolutionary government at Verkhne-Udinsk have acquainted the commander of the Japanese forces at Chita, on more than one occasion, with their proposal of a similar character and with other proposals regarding the establishment of an independent political institution for Far Eastern Russia, I feel it incumbent upon me to make herewith the following declaration:

The Japanese military command, which has no territorial ambitions whatever in Siberia, feels the deepest sympathy with the Russian population in Far Eastern Russia, and earnestly hopes that a stabilization of political affairs and restoration of order in the daily life of the people in that region will soon deliver them from the hardships and difficulty under which they are suffering at present.

The recent military events in Vladivostok were due to the course the insubordinate partisans were suffered to pursue in their disorganized activity, which the Japanese Army had had to feel as an increasing pressure brought to bear upon it, and as a growing menace to the integrity of its position.

Under such circumstances the Japanese Army had only one course to follow in its self-defense.

Japan wishes to make it likewise most clear that it can in no wise tolerate the existence, in any country in close geographical relations with its own territory, of any political organization that defies humanity and attempts to disturb the peace of the world.

In view of the rapid progress of the repatriation of the Czech troops toward its final accomplishment, the Japanese military command wishes hereby to express its readiness to effect the military evacuation of Siberia when conditions in Far Eastern Russia have been readjusted on a stable and assuring basis, when all menace to Korea and Manchuria has been removed, and when the safety of life and property of our civil population has been guaranteed.

The Japanese command is not only earnest in its hope that the conditions in Far Eastern Russia will soon attain such a consummation, but also is no less eager in manifesting its regard for the opinion of the Russian people, and the Japanese command does not mean to defy their sentiment by according support to any particular section of the Russian population, thereby aggravating political conditions in the country.

It will be a matter of no less solicitude to our command than to the Russian population if Far Eastern Russia can be established on a basis of such form of self-government as to meet with the approval of the people.

It is to be hoped, too, that economic relations be resumed, that the population in these parts of Russia may be relieved from their present hardships and privations.

In order to expedite matters for such satisfactory arrangements as described above it is necessary that the Russian Army be caused to cease acts of hostility against the Japanese forces at Chita and provide an inviolable zone of neutrality between the two armies in these parts.

This accomplished, the unification and autonomy of Far Eastern Russia may be expected, based on such an arrangement.

It is hardly necessary to say that the Japanese command will refrain from all interference, and when the state of political affairs has been brought to such a stage as to make it possible adequately to guarantee the making of such political arrangements, and when, consequently, peace has come in sight, the Japanese command will welcome the final arrival of the time for such military evacuation of Siberia.

Such are the hopes of the Japanese military command, and in these, to be sure, our Government as well as our people are agreed.

This solicitude we feel for the future, we trust, is shared by the Russian population.

However, we feel that it will not be altogether impertinent to say in this connection that the action taken by the Russian force at Nikolayevski was a very deplorable affair.

Our military force, being small in number, was driven back and annihilated, our consul was killed, and a great number of the Japanese population there was massacred or subjected to all sorts of unspeakable humiliation.

The incidents in question have profoundly impressed the Japanese nation.

It appears quite logical that this affair be considered as a separate issue and estimated on its own account for proper settlement.

(Signed) GEN. MARIMOTO OI,
Commander of Japanese Expeditionary Forces in Siberia.

RUSSO-JAPANESE AGREEMENT REGARDING THE MILITIA IN THE MARITIME PROVINCE.

In accordance with paragraph 6 of the Russo-Japanese agreement of April 29 the number and arms of the militia units are established by the Russian authorities, with the knowledge of the Japanese command.

In order to execute the above the following project is proposed:

1. The number of militia within the district outlined in paragraph 2 of the Russo-Japanese agreement of April 29, 1920, is to be 4,250.

2. The entire militia is divided as follows:

a. Administrative.
b. Railroad.
c. Special militia reserves for combating criminal gangs.
d. Vladivostok Fortress militia.

3. The numbers of the above-mentioned divisions of militia are to be as follows:

a. Administrative militia (city and county), 2,300 men.
b. Railroad militia, 300 men.
c. Special militia reserves, 1,350 men.
d. Vladivostok Fortress militia, 300 men.

4. The 4,250 men established by the commission are divided within the districts of the Province as follows:

a. Vladivostok district: City militia, 1,100 men. Reserves, 600 men. Fortress militia, 300 men.

b. Khabarovsk district: City militia, 250 men. County militia, 100 men. Reserves, 250 men.

c. Nikolsk-Usurisk district: City militia, 250 men. County militia, 200 men (including Posiet, Barabsh, and Grodekovo). Reserves, 300 men.

d. Iman district: County militia, 200 men. Reserves, 200 men.

e. Olginsk district (including Suchan and Skhotovo), 200 men.

f. Militia for Ussuri Railroad, 300 men.

5. The entire militia of the Provinces with the exception of the fortress militia, i. e., railroad, administrative, and special militia reserve, are under orders and at the disposal of the ministry of the interior, through the government inspector of militia.

The fortress militia is under orders of the commandant of the fortress.

6. The functions of the various groups of militia are defined by the existing government regulations or by regulations which may be issued by the government.

7. The militia is to be armed as follows: Two-thirds of the city, county, railroad, and fortress militia is to be equipped with sabers and revolvers and one-third of the above with rifles.

8. The arms are issued by the Japanese command from the supplies of Russian arms which are under Japanese guard.

ARMISTICE TREATY BETWEEN THE JAPANESE AND THE VERKHNE-UDINSK GOVERNMENT.

We, the undersigned, representatives of the Japanese expeditionary army on the territory of the Far East and of the government of the Far Eastern Republic, who have gathered for the purpose of ending military operations, which have taken place against the wish of either side, are negotiating regarding their cessation.

1. On the Amur front (on the left and right shores of the River Shilka), which are concluded by our local military commanders.

2. Regarding the cessation of military operations on the Transbaikal front, in the district of the Yablonovi Mountain ridge, while concluding this treaty regarding the cessation of military operations on all fronts, we have arrived at the following understanding:

I, the representative of the Far Eastern Republic and of the chief command of the people's revolutionary army, in their name, assume all obligations arrived at in this treaty, which is concluded between the local commands of both sides and which is signed for the Japanese expeditionary forces by Col. Katosadziro and for the Amur units of the people's revolutionary army by Citizen Victor Londo, regarding the cessation of military operations on the left as well as the right shores of the River Shilka. This agreement is to go into effect in the district of the left shore of the River Shilka on July 2, and in the district of the right shore of this river on July 10, 1920.

I, the representative of the Japanese expeditionary army on the territory of the Far East, have the sincere desire to end the military operations on all fronts of the territory of the Russian Far East.

In view of the fact that the Verkhne-Udinsk government is not the only government in the territory of the Russian Far East, and in view of the fact that this government is not regarded by the Japanese command as the principal government on the territory of the Russian Far East, the Japanese command can not conclude an agreement with the Verkhne-Udinsk government to end military operations on all fronts of the Russian Far East.

There is a difference of opinion between the two parties on this subject. Thus, if no agreement can be reached, it will remain impossible to conclude a treaty regarding the cessation of military operations on all fronts of the territory of the Russian Far East.

The principal problem is outside of the jurisdiction of the representatives of the Japanese command, and therefore a settlement of this problem is left to further negotiations.

It is the desire of both sides that peace be reestablished as soon as possible on the territory of the Far East, therefore this treaty is being concluded so that hostilities may cease on the Transbaikal front and in the district of the Yablonovi Mountain ridge.

The treaty provides as follows:

1. The troops of both sides must not go beyond the established lines of demarcation and must not carry on any military operations, including aerial military operations.

2. On the Transbaikal front, in the district of Yablonovi Mountain ridge, the line of the Japanese forces begins from the junction point of the roads Podvolochnaya-Telemba and River Usmukan. From this point the line follows meridian 113° 30′; to the south the line follows through the junction of the road Shaksha-Telemba with the road Telemba-Verkhne-Chitinsky further through the point northwest of Beklemishev, 10 versts on the old Moscow road, which is also known as the Old Chitinsky. Further the railroad bridge across the River Zuzugan, which is 10 versts east of Station Gongota, until Kodakhta; from here the line goes to the south parallel with the meridian 112° 30′.

The line of the people's revolutionary army begins at Telemba and then runs north, parallel with meridian 113° 30′; to the south, elevation Kondinskaya, Station Gongota; then the line of the people's revolutionary army follows through Uletuyskoye and further south along the meridian 112° 30′.

All the above-mentioned points within a radius of 1 verst are the spheres of influence of the sides which occupy them at the present time.

[NOTE.—The regulation of civic affairs in the neutral zone between the line of the Japanese expeditionary forces and the line of the people's revolutionary army is left to the authorities of the Far Eastern Republic, with the understanding that the population will not be utilized for military operations.]

3. Station Gongota is the last point on the railroad for trains coming from the west, and Station Sohondo is the last point for trains coming from the east.

[NOTE.—Between Stations Gongota and Sohondo telephone connections are established so that negotiations can be carried on in case urgent action is necessary in order that diplomats or other individuals may pass from Station Gongota or Sohondo.]

4. Noon of July 18, 1920, is the time for the cessation of military operations. Before that time the commands of both sides must inform their units regarding the cessation of military operations, and must in the various districts exchange the orders regarding the cessation of military operations. Until that time neither side is to undertake any military operations against the other.

[NOTE.—Truce bearers on both sides in exchanging documents are to use the following roads]:

a. Telemba—Upper Chita.

b. Old Chita (also known as old Moscow).

c. The railroad line.

d. Kodakhta-Ulyantuy.

5. This treaty is to expire upon the conclusion of the work of the representatives who truly express the will of the people of the Russian Far East.

6. In case any misunderstandings arise and this state of peace is broken and hostilities are to begin both sides are to give 10 days' notice.

[NOTE TO THE TREATY.—Troops under the command of Semenov recognize this treaty which is guaranteed by the representatives of the Japanese expeditionary army on the territory of the Far East.]

The basis of this agreement is the note from the chief of the Japanese delegation, Maj. Gen. Takayanagi, to the chairman of the peace delegation of the Far Eastern Republic, W. S. Shatov, under No. 4, dated July 12, 1920.

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN SHATOV AND TAKAYANAGI.

The commander of the Fifth Japanese Division, who has received instructions from the commander of the Japanese expeditionary army in Vladivostok, and the Government of the Far Eastern Republic, which sent its representatives to the station of Gongota, have concluded an agreement concerning the discontinuance of military activities, and, availing themselves of this opportunity, both delegations, within the limits of the authority conferred upon them, have discussed also other questions connected with military matters, and exchanged the notes transmitted as the result of the deliberations.

NOTE REFERRED TO IN THE MEMORANDUM OF JULY 17, 1920.

Anxious to bring about, as soon as possible, peace in the territory of the Russian Far East, the Japanese and Russian delegations are convinced that the best means for the attainment of this purpose, and for the establishment of peace and order, is the creation of a buffer State with a single government, in the affairs of which the armed forces of other Governments should not interfere.

In its international and economic relations this buffer State can not remain in a state of isolation from the civilized countries possessing a highly developed industry. There exists the closest community of interests between the territory of the Russian Far East and Japan, and for this reason the buffer State must necessarily entertain relations of the closest friendship and intercourse with Japan.

In pursuance of the above-mentioned principles, both delegations fully agree in the conviction that the buffer State will not accept communism as the basis of its social system, and that it will have a popular character along broad democratic lines. For this reason the present situation makes necessary the convocation of a conference of representatives who will legally and independently express the will of the population of the territory of the Russian Far East.

In accordance with this understanding of the tasks set before them, both delegations make the following mutual statement:

1. The Japanese delegation declares that the individual relations of the Japanese military command with the local authorities will be discontinued with the conclusion of the work of the conference of representatives, who will legitimately and independently express the will of the population of the Russian Far East, and will finally give approval to the creation of a single government.

2. The Japanese delegation declares that the Japanese command will not interfere with the manner in which the above-mentioned conference will be called nor with its deliberations, and promises to offer every possible assistance should obstacles be placed in the way of the delegates who are going to that conference, regardless of their political opinions.

3. Concerning the question of the continued stay of Japanese troops on the territory of the Russian Far East, the Japanese delegation takes the position stated in the declaration of the Japanese Government of July 3.

With reference to the region of Transbaikalia, the Japanese military command, in accordance with the declaration made by the Japanese Imperial Government, has decided this time to withdraw its troops from the above-mentioned region in consideration of the fact that at the present time the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak troops from this region has already been completed. The Japanese command hopes that in case its relations with the Far Eastern Republic remain satisfactory the evacuation of the Japanese troops will be completed in a short time.

4. The Russian delegation declares that the armies of European soviet Russia will not be admitted to the territory of the Government of the Far Eastern Republic, and that they will not be allowed to stay, to encroach upon, or to pass through that territory.

5. The Russian delegation declares that the Government of the Far Eastern Republic promises, on the basis of a mutuality concession, that within the sphere of its influence it will guarantee the inviolability of person of Japanese citizens and that it will respect their rights.

6. In the hope of bringing about an early pacification of the territory of the eastern Republic, the Japanese and Russian delegations declare that the Japanese command and the Government of the Far Eastern Republic bind themselves to undertake all necessary measures to settle peacefully all conflicts, but, in case of necessity, they promise to take the most energetic steps.

7. The Japanese and Russian delegations declare that after a preliminary mutual agreement each government may send its military missions to the other, since these missions will be very useful in the matter of a successful solution of the questions which may arise in the future.

The Representative of the Japanese Army.

PROTEST AGAINST THE NONADMISSION OF THE VERKHNE-UDINSK DELEGATION TO CHITA.

To the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Japan, to the High Commissioner for Japanese Affairs, Matsudaira, and to Gen. Takayanagi:

On September 4 we, the representatives of civic organizations and political parties of the independent Far East, accompanied by Col. Isome, the head of the Japanese mission in the city of Verkhne-Udinsk, started on our way to Chita. The aim of our delegation, in which all political elements were amply represented, was to gather all the democratic elements of the Far East and to consolidate them in one single endeavor for the purpose of bringing about the rule of law and order through the medium of the free expression of the will of the population of the Russian Far East. After our arrival at the station of Gongota we were held up by the Japanese mission in Chita, owing to the fact that Ataman Semenov was staying there, who was again trying to impose his rule by means of violence and through the suppression of the democratic elements of Chita.

We suppose that on the basis of the armistice agreement and on the basis of the statements of the Japanese military command and the Japanese mission we have the right to move freely on the entire territory of the Far East.

All the persons who are placing obstacles in the way of our work are directly or indirectly contributing to the strengthening of anarchy in our country. In the name of the people of the Far Eastern Republic, which elected us, we protest also against the activities enabling Ataman Semenov to disrupt the Far East and to suppress the free will of the population with the help of armed forces, which again have been introduced to Chita.

At the time when the entire population of the city of Chita expressed itself in favor of a reunion with the Far Eastern Republic the new attempt of Semenov to impose his rule can not be endured by anybody.

We declare that the free people of central Transbaikalia will be unable to remain indifferent while such an act of violence is being committed against their free will and that the flames of civil war are likely to flare up again.

Protesting against such acts of hostility, which are directed against the free democratic institutions, we hope that the higher authorities of the Japanese Government and of the military command will take urgent steps to enable our delegation to pass immediately to Chita.

RUSSO-JAPANESE ADJUSTMENT COMMISSION.

Letter of the chairman of the Japanese section of the Russo-Japanese Adjustment Commission to Mr. Zeitlin, chairman of the Russian section of the commission.

The commander of the Japanese troops in Siberia in his statements more than once expressed the wish for an early adjustment of the political situation in the Far East, together with the reestablishment of good and neighborly relations between the Japanese and the Russian people.

The Russian authorities considered the question of the fusion of the administrations of the various regions of the Far East as a necessary condition for the erection of a buffer State in the Far East.

The question has been considered from all points of view and is nearing its solution. We are convinced that in this question your Government has already taken a definite position. In view of the fact that this question is closely connected with the question of the continued presence of Japanese troops in the Far East, the Japanese section of the commission, according to instructions from the commander of the Japanese forces, would like to learn from the Russian section of the commission the opinion of your Government as to the following questions:

1. May we be assured of the fact that the program of your Government, as announced on August 19 of the current year and ratified by the National Assembly at Vladivostok, is final and will not be changed?

2. Does the memorandum exchanged between the representatives of the National Assembly in Vladivostok and the Verkhne-Udinsk Government, which has been recognized by the former, change in any way the principles of your Government as indicated under (1) above?

3. Concerning the structure of the new government, is it to be understood as:

(a) A moderate, democratic, republican form of government, to the exclusion of monarchist as well as of communist principles?

(b) Having constitutional parliamentary institutions, the members of which are to be elected from among all classes, nationalities, and political parties?

4. Is it to be understood in such a way that the new State in the Far East, while entertaining relations with soviet Russia, excludes communist principles in its political and economic relations and recognizes and puts into effect the principles of a bourgeois-capitalist system?

5. Is it to be understood that the new united State formed in the Far East is fully independent in its foreign policy and that its relations with soviet Russia are based purely on treaties?

6. Is it to be expected that in the new united State of the Far East life, property, the right of domicile and removal will be guaranteed to foreigners, as well as the free investment of capital on the principles of the open door and of equal rights?

7. If in consequence of negotiations with other powers there should occur any changes in the above-mentioned fundamental points recognized by your Government, may we expect you to notify us of such changes?

8. Is it to be hoped that the fundamental principles which were unanimously adopted by all the regional administrations will not undergo any changes at the hands of the Constituent Assembly and will be embodied in the laws and in the decrees?

RUSSO-JAPANESE ADJUSTMENT COMMISSION.

The answer of Mr. Zeitlin, chairman of the Russian section of the Russo-Japanese Adjustment Commission, to the chairman of the Japanese section of the commission.

In reply to the communication which was transmitted by you, as to the wish of the commander of the Japanese troops in Siberia to learn the opinion of our Government concerning a number of questions, I beg to inform you as follows in the name of the Government:

1. The program of the government, announced on August 19 of the current year and approved by the national assembly, being a logical expression of the principles of the fundamental declaration of the government of July 21 of the current year, is final for the government and is not subject to any changes.

2. The memorandum signed by the delegation of the national assembly in Verkhne-Udinsk does not affect the program of our government as indicated under 1.

3. The political and social system of the future Far Eastern State is to take the following form, in accordance with the aims of our government:

(a) Democratic-republican, absolutely excluding the restoration of monarchy as well as the establishment of communism.

(b) Constitutional and parliamentarian, founded on the basis of universal suffrage, without excluding any classes, nationalities, or political parties.

4. The new state created in the Far East is conceived by our government as entertaining treaty relations with Soviet Russia, excluding, however, the putting into effect of communism in political and economic matters, and presupposing that the policy conducted will be along the lines of a bourgeois-capitalist system.

5. The above-mentioned state organization, which is entertaining treaty relations with Soviet Russia, is conceived by our government as a state that is completely self-governing and independent in matters of foreign policy.

6. According to the fundamental ideas of the government, life and property of foreigners, as well as their right to residence and removal, must be fully guaranteed in the new state organization; likewise, for the development of commerce and industry, foreign capital will be invited on the principles of the open door and equal rights.

7. The government does not permit of the possibility of changing the fundamental principles of its program; at the same time our government is always ready, on a reciprocal basis, to inform the representatives of the Japanese Government of all steps undertaken for putting into effect the government's program, in so far as such information might interest the representatives of the neighboring nation and facilitate the bringing about of mutual understanding and confidence.

8. The fundamental principles adopted by all provincial administrations, being based on a sound understanding of the international situation and the internal alignment of forces, shall, at the discretion of the government, be put into effect in the form of laws and decrees after they have received the approval of the constituent assembly.

THE JAPANESE ON THE EMBARGO ON VALUABLES FROM THE MARITIME PROVINCE.

The chairman of the Russian delegation of the Russo-Japanese adjustment commission received from the chief command of the gendarmerie division of the Japanese expeditionary forces a communication the contents of which were as follows:

According to the agreement between the Japanese and the Russians, concluded at the time when the Japanese command returned to the Russian authorities the gold and silver that had been taken away, and according to the declaration made by the representative of the Japanese diplomatic mission to your government at the end of November last, it is inadmissible to export from the maritime Province gold, silver, and valuables belonging to the Vladivostok government.

Although the Government is convinced that the corresponding organs of your government are watching over the fulfillment of this clause, nevertheless the Japanese command is obliged to watch over this matter. It has been ascertained that efforts have been made to export gold and silver without the knowledge of the Japanese command, and for this reason very often goods in transit have to be held up in order to ascertain their contents.

We believe that it will be convenient for the parties and that it would aid in expediting matters if silver would be exported only after the receipt of a certificate from the local chief of gendarmerie, and where there is no such office from the local chief of the Japanese military command, after informing the latter in advance of the forwarding of the objects in question. In order to put these instructions into effect the gendarmerie command especially wants you to inform to this effect all the Russian authorities concerned in this matter. These instructions must be observed also in case the articles in question are transferred between various government institutions in the same city.

NOTE TO THE JAPANESE MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

While ordering its Army to occupy Russian Far Eastern territory, the Imperial Japanese Government, by its proclamation of August 2, 1918, clearly stated to the Russian people and to the world that this extraordinary measure was being taken solely "for the sake of rendering assistance to the Czecho-Slovak Army," and that "maintaining its established policy of unqualified friendship toward Russia and the Russian people" and recognizing "the territorial integrity of Russia" and "forbearing from interference in the internal affairs of the Government," "upon the fulfillment of the mission above stated; that is, upon the completion of the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak Army, the Japanese Army will unconditionally leave the Russion territory."

The evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak Army was successfully completed in August, 1920.

However, long before the completion of this evacuation by its declaration of March 31, 1919, the Imperial Government of Japan proclaimed that "as no other country is geographically so closely connected with Siberia as our Empire, and whereas the political condition of the Far East is such as to threaten not only the life and property of our citizens living in Siberia, but also the peace in Korea and Manchuria, we regret to state that we consider it impossible to evacuate our troops from the Far Eastern territory. And the Government of Japan reiterates that the presence of its Army upon the territory of the Far East does not mean any political aggression against Russia," and again in this act the Government of Japan "sincerely states that as soon as peace will be established within the territory, the Japanese Army will immediately leave."

The same statement was reiterated by the commander of the expeditionary Army, Gen. Oi, in his notes to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Far Eastern Republic, of May 11 and September 18, always expressing his sincerest desire for the speediest unification of the separate territories of the Far East, regarding it not only as beneficial for the Russian population, but as a condition preceding the establishment of economic relations between the nations. In his declaration of May 11 Gen. Oi states literally as follows: "The Japanese command will, with pleasure, lead its troops out of Russian territory as soon as stable conditions are established on Russian domains in the Far East," and that "the Japanese command, considering the will of the Russian population, does not wish to complicate the political situation of the region by rendering assistance to individual Russians who might tend to disregard the will of the whole Russian population. The Japanese command, together with the Russian population, heartily welcomes the establishment within the territories of the Far Eastern region of such a form of government as will conform to the will of the people." It was also plainly declared "that the above is not only the wish of the Japanese military command, but also that of our Government and people."

The Russian people, having lost faith in its various self-styled saviors, decided, upon its own volition, and not at all because of demands made by foreigners, to establish such order as will make it possible once and for all for the will of the people to freely express itself over the whole area of the Russian Far East.

The authorized representatives of the whole people have gathered in Chita on October 29, 1920, and have most solemnly proclaimed the union of all the territories of the Far East in one independent self-governing Far Eastern Republic beginning with the day of the declaration of independence, namely, April 6, 1920. The same declaration laid down the first basic principles upon which the Government must be built in order to bring about law and order and peaceful development of all social forces. At the same conference a law was passed for the convening of the constituent assembly, and a Government was formed to bring into effect the will of the people. All these solemn declarations were published in due time and made known to the whole world.

Two months have passed since the establishment of the Far Eastern Republic. The Government of the Far Eastern Republic is steadfastly following the road that is pointed out by the declaration of October 29, 1920. The election of the constituent assembly has already taken place. Within 10 days the representatives of the people will be gathering in the capital of the Far Eastern Republic in order to draw up a constitution for the country and decide upon the important vital problems of the government. The internal war which was still flickering in some parts of the country prior to the unification has died of itself. All classes of the population are steadfastly striving for a peaceful life and labor with a view to rebuilding all that was destroyed. The Vladivostok People's Assembly, laboring under extraordinarily hard circumstances, due to intervention, and in spite of various memoranda and veiled threats by the High Command of the Japanese forces, the chief of staff and the head of the diplomatic mission, has by an overwhelming majority recognized the Government of the Far Eastern Republic. These are the heroic results of the aspirations of our people for unity, its burning desire to overcome the intervention.

On the territory of the Far Eastern Republic, freed from intervention, law and order reign supreme; the life, free labor, and the property of all citizens are absolutely safe. Numerous foreigners residing in the Republic enjoy the same rights as the native citizens, and their lives and property are as safe as in any other civilized country.

Concluding on the basis of the above-named facts that the further arrival and sojourn of Japanese troops on the Russian territory is not only unjustifiable but absolutely harmful, the vice minister for foreign affairs, Mr. Kojevnikov, by order of the Government of the Far Eastern Republic, most explicitly brought to the attention of the Japanese Imperial Government, through the chief of the Japanese diplomatic mission in Vladivostok, the urgent necessity to most speedily evacuate the Japanese forces from the Far East, and he further made known the readiness of the Government of the Far Eastern Republic to commence negotiations with the Imperial Government of Japan with the view of concluding a treaty of everlasting friendship and of establishing economic relations for mutual benefit, firmly believing that there is no problem between the Government of the Far Eastern Republic and the Imperial Government of Japan which could not be solved peacefully by negotiation.

However, the Japanese army continues forcibly to occupy part of the territory of our Republic, thereby making life unbearable to the population of that part of the territory of the Republic on which these forces are situated.

Taking advantage of the presence of Japanese troops and their actual suppression of any and all attempts to establish order on the part of the population and their governmental organs, which suppression is contrary to all declarations, the criminal elements are doing their contemptible work. Russian cities and villages in the zone of intervention are enveloped in a poisonous cloud, as it were, of robbery, murder, and all kinds of unspeakable crimes.

Some lawless persons at the station of Grodekovo on the Ussuri Railroad are stopping trains, searching and robbing passengers, and taking many of them off, beating them, and very often leading them away, nobody knows where. These same criminals ride in the trains without paying their fare, force railroad agents to give them special locomotives, and, not receiving them, detach engines from trains (case of November 28 at the station of Grodekovo). They also take away from Russian, as well as from foreign passengers, silver and other belongings, which is much like open highway robbery. The local authorities find it impossible to establish order, thanks to the opposition of the Japanese military command to the lawful authorities and its sympathy with the enemies of law and order. The Japanese command by force of arms is restraining the authorities of the law from combating the criminals and establishing order—which means an absolute violation of the right of self-determination of the people.

The sympathies of the Japanese military command for the enemies of the people were most vividly expressed when it conducted under its protection Semenov, that criminal and enemy of the people, through Russian territory, defying the whole Russian and foreign population, and officially announcing this fact to the former Maritime Government, as if challenging its impotence, took him to Port Arthur with a guard of honor of the army of the Imperial Government of Japan, thereby openly scorning the feelings of the free people. This criminal is now issuing orders in which he promises to start a new adventure in the spring, and while he is openly proclaiming that Japan is and will be rendering him assistance, he is thereby arousing against Japan the population and awakening an old hatred, thus hindering the establishment of good neighborly relations.

The Japanese command is not allowing the attachment of paymasters' cars to trains which are on their way to pay salaries to the railroad employees, and is obstructing the movement of almost all freight, thereby completely and without cover interfering with the inner life of the Far Eastern Republic. It has also held up the car of the secretary of the military-diplomatic mission of the former Verkhne-Udinsk government, which has since become a part of the Far Eastern Republic, attempting to search him and his car, thus violating the most elementary laws with regard to diplomatic representatives established by the practice of international law, and giving the population the impression that all official Japanese declarations are mere words.

Needless to say, all these actions on the part of the Japanese are awakening within the minds of the Russian people doubts as to the genuineness of the solemn declarations of the Japanese Government and forcing them to be on the alert.

True to the mandates of our people, and directed by the same desire as are the people, the government of the Far Eastern Republic thinks it necessary with a view to establishing peaceful mutual relations between both countries and peoples: 1. That the high command of the Japanese Expeditionary Forces in Vladivostok, in the actions carried out by its subordinates, should adhere to the principle of absolute noninterference in the internal affairs of the Far Eastern Republic and desist from rendering assistance to separate groups of the population in their domestic struggles, as was the case with the assistance given to the Grodekovo band; 2, that in view of the fact that the region is quiet and that a strong government has been established, the time is appropriate for a definite date to be set for the evacuation of the Japanese troops from the territory of the Far Eastern Republic by the Imperial Government.

Considering the fact that upon the territory of the Far Eastern Republic there is at present a Japanese diplomatic mission, the government asks kindly to be informed whether the Japanese Imperial Government will agree to receive our mission in Tokyo upon the just principle of reciprocity, with the aim of speedily establishing political and economic relations based on such treaties as will be for the mutual benefit and friendship of both the Japanese and Russian peoples. We trust that this will speed the long-hoped-for day of mutual understanding and peaceful neighborly relations between the two peoples.

A. KRASNOSHCHEKOV,
Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Far Eastern Republic.

CHITA, January 19, 1921.

PROTEST AGAINST VIOLATION OF THE NEUTRAL ZONE BY THE JAPANESE.

To the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Japanese Imperial Government:

According to information received from local authorities, the Japanese troops have advanced beyond the limits of the 30-kilometer zone agreed upon, and on February 23 of the current year occupied the following settlements: Yakovlevka, 60 versts east of the station of Yevgenyevka; Pokrovka, 5 versts east of Yakovlevka; Sysoyevka, between Anuchyn and Yakovlevka.

By thus transferring its troops into a region from which the Japanese troops had been withdrawn, the Japanese military command only complicates the situation without any plausible reasons. As far back as May 11, 1920, Gen. Oi, the commander of the Japanese Expeditionary Forces, had announced in his declaration: "Now that the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak troops is nearing its end, I declare openly that the Japanese command will gladly evacuate its troops as soon as the situation of the Russian possessions in the Far East will be firmly established." In the same declaration it was emphasized that: "The Japanese command, jointly with the Russian population, welcomes with all its heart the formation on the territory of the Far East of a state based on the principles of self-government and on the introduction of such political forms as will correspond to the will of the entire population." And further on, in the same document: "The Japanese command will welcome the moment when, the establishment of the above-mentioned state organization and the pacification of the country being assured, it will be possible to evacuate the troops. I have not the slightest doubt that this is not only the wish of the Japanese command but also of our Government and of our people."

From the point of view of the Japanese Government this moment was reached long ago, because in its declaration of July 3, 1920, it announced the evacuation of Transbaikalia, and Gen. Oi, the commander of the expeditionary forces, referring to the declaration of September 18, declared solemnly: "In consideration of the fact that the political situation in the aforesaid region (Khabarovsk) is again becoming normal, I hereby announce that our troops will be evacuated from there. At the same time I express my sincere wish that the Russian territory in the Far East may be united as soon as possible, so as to secure peace and welfare to the country and to strengthen the good neighborly relations between the Russian and the Japanese peoples."

At a solemn moment, when the constituent assembly, composed of the authorized representatives of the entire Russian population in the Far East, is earnestly working at the task of finally creating and forming the Far Eastern Republic, when the work of the final unification of the Russian Far East is nearing its completion, when in all places evacuated by the Japanese troops peace and order reign, the reoccupation by the Japanese troops of localities which were already once evacuated under the most solemn declarations is an absolutely unjustifiable act, and is in outright contradiction to numerous official assurances of the Government and of the Japanese military command.

These activities of the Japanese military command assume a more alarming character in view of the fact that simultaneously strange and suspicious individuals purposely disseminate malicious rumors purporting that the partisans are again preparing their attacks within the limits of the Maritime Province and that the armed forces of the Far Eastern Republic are preparing aggressive activities.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic has time and again declared, and again solemnly declares, that it has absolutely no aggressive intentions or plans with reference to the Japanese troops. The Government was doing and is doing its best for a peaceful cessation of intervention and for the creation of the most friendly relations between the population of the Russian Far East and the Japanese nation.

But to its great regret the Government is compelled to state that all its efforts to efface from the memory of the population all the unfortunate impressions connected with the hostile activities of the Japanese troops on Russian territory may prove vain if the Japanese command will continue its policy of advancing its troops into places which it had already once left, thus disturbing and irritating the population over and over again.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic considers it its duty to protest against such activities of the Japanese military command, which lead not to the unity of the Far East and to the strengthening of its democratic State organization but, on the contrary, to its dismemberment.

A. KRASNOSHCHEKOV,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

NOTE TO JAPANESE MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic, not only in its declarations but also in its practical everyday activity, has spared no pains to maintain the population in a condition of complete tranquillity and self-control, its patience having repeatedly been put to severe trials.

Incessant murders of absolutely innocent persons by armed bandits calling themselves "Semenov's men," etc., have been irritating and inflaming, and are still inflaming, the population up to the present day.

A short time ago these criminals again stained themselves with blood; several scores of people were killed in the settlements of Razdolnoye, Khorol, and Zharikov, the population of Fadyevka was disarmed and left at the mercy of the Khunkhuses (Chinese bandits), and a number of citizens were abducted to an unknown destination. Persons of suspicious character are launching and spreading rumors that the bands of Semenov are, as previously, supported, inspired, and armed by the Japanese military command, and that in a not distant future these bands will again start their attacks, with the full support of the Japanese military command. For reasons which are only known to themselves, these individuals are endeavoring to instill in the Russian population the poison of a distrust in all the open and secret activities of the Japanese command, thus spreading hostility between the Japanese and the Russian peoples.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic is disinclined to believe these maliciously disseminated rumors, but it is unfortunately compelled to state that the attitude of the Japanese command toward the Russian authorities, which are endeavoring to protect the innocently suffering population, is not always clear, and that this is quite likely to strengthen the conviction among the population that the disseminated rumors are based on truth.

In spite of the revolting crimes of Semenov's men, who have gathered in Grodekovo and who are still gathering in other places also, in spite of the protest of the Russian authorities against the unlawful gathering of armed forces in Grodekovo, in spite of the repeated attempts of these authorities to dispatch militia to disarm these bandits and restore order, the Japanese command systematically declines to settle this matter by pretending ignorance of the fact that armed forces are staying in Grodekovo, a fact which is too well known to all those who live in the Maritime Province, and especially to all those who have the misfortune of passing through, or of accidentally arriving at Grodekovo. Matters went so far that on February 8 of the current year the former Col. Dompel, who, citing a mandate issued by Semenov, calls himself the chief of the military communications of the army of Grodekovo, declared without any ceremony that all ranks and institutions of the former army of Kappel are abolished, unless the persons who had occupied them declared their recognition of the authority of Gen. Savelyev, commander of the Grodekovo army.

We are informed by local authorities that when Gen. Ochi, the aid-de-camp of the Japanese Emperor, passed through the station of Grodekovo, the commanding staff of this army, headed by the aforesaid Gen. Savelyev, was introduced to him, and that the armed forces were reviewed.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic is endeavoring to bring about sincere and friendly relations between the Japanese and Russian peoples, and for this purpose it considers it essential that the activities of those who are trying to spread distrust between the Russian population and the Japanese command be stopped. These activities would be doubtless stopped and the malicious rumors would immediately be silenced if the Japanese command would affirm:

1. That in reality it neither inspires, supports, nor arms the so-called Semenovists and the other counter-revolutionists.

2. That it really does not conduct any negotiations with them as to any aggressions against the Russian Government and that, as far as it itself is concerned, it is not opposing the Government of the Far Eastern Republic.

Such a confirmation would tell the population that the Japanese command is standing by all the solemn declarations of the Japanese Government as to noninterference in our internal affairs. It is self-evident that if the Japanese Government would declare that its troops are only temporarily stationed on Russian territory, and that, owing to the accomplished unity of the Far East and the deliberations of the constituent assembly, their evacuation is imminent, such a statement would be received by the population with great satisfaction.

A clear, vigorous, and frank expression on the part of the representatives of the Japanese command would help the Government of the Far Eastern Republic in its endeavor to efface from the memory of the population all the wrongs it has been forced to bear, and in good faith to establish friendly mutual relations.

NOTE TO THE JAPANESE MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

I. On March 21, 1921, Lieut. Gen. Kosina, the commander in chief of the expeditionary forces in the Sakhalin district, referring to the declaration of the Japanese Government of July 3, 1920, announced to the population of that district the forthcoming occupation of Nikolayevsk, De Castri, Mago, Sofisk, and other places, and the installation in these points of a civil government "for the reestablishment of peace and order."

II. After the night of March 30-31, when armed criminal bands of counter-revolutionaries in Vladivostok attacked the lawful authorities and the constituent assembly, the Japanese command, which during the whole night had not interfered with the excesses of the criminals, disarmed the militia, which was carrying out its duties in the defense of the life and property of Russian and foreign citizens.

III. On April 12, by order of the Japanese Government, the Japanese consulate general in Vladivostok announced that the chief of the military administrative department of the Japanese command in Sakhalin had made public an announcement of February 19, 1921, concerning the auction of leases for Russian fisheries, the office of the military administrative command in Sakhalin (Alexandrovsk) being designated as the premises in which the auction was to take place; and in this announcement it was stated that "persons who wished to inspect the aforesaid list, the regulations and rules, might consult them in the Japanese language in the consulate."

IV. In the course of the last few days fresh Japanese troops have begun to arrive in Vladivostok.

V. On April 19 a Japanese transport arrived in De Castri and landed troops; a Japanese radio station was installed; Japanese censorship was established over the Russian telegraph station and it was prohibited to communicate with the higher Russian authorities without the permission of the Japanese.

The introduction of troops and of a Japanese civil administration more than nine months after the declaration of July 3, 1920, during which time peace and order had not once been disturbed in these places, and when not the slightest danger threatened the numerous Japanese residents or their interests; the disarmament of the government militia and the support given to the counter-revolutionary criminals; the arbitrary institution of auctions of Russian fishery rights, with the permission given to the (presumably Russian) competitors to ascertain the Japanese rules in the "Japanese language in the consulate," and the landing of fresh troops in Vladivostok—all these facts occurring at the time when the constituent assembly is terminating its work for the final shaping of the young far eastern democratic republic, can not help strengthening in the minds of the population the conviction as to the openly annexionist tendencies of the Japanese Government, which at this time is no longer making use of such pretexts as the "danger menacing the Czecho-Slovaks, Korea, Manchuria," etc.

If the Japanese Government was sincere in its declaration of July 3, 1920, and in reality considered the measures taken by it as temporary "until the organization of a lawful government," this moment for the restitution of their rights to the Russian people and for the return to normal conditions has certainly arrived, now that the Russian Far East is ruled by a body that is invested with all the power of a lawful popular government.

Protesting energetically against all the above-mentioned violations of the sovereign rights of the Russian people, the government of the Far Eastern Republic is again compelled to point out that a persistent continuation of such a policy, which is in contradiction to all the solemn declarations and assurances of the Japanese Government, can not contribute to the strengthening of the friendly relations between the Russian and Japanese peoples.

Not by encroaching upon the sovereign rights of the Russian people, but by sincere and friendly negotiations on mutual needs and interests will it be possible to create that stable and normal situation which is needed not only by the Russian and Japanese populations but also the whole world and which, according to its repeated assurances, is also the aim of the Japanese Government.

Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

CHITA, April 21, 1921.

APPEAL OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY TO THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT.

To the IMPERIAL JAPANESE GOVERNMENT:

In the early part of August, 1918, the Japanese Imperial Government issued a declaration to the Russian people, in which it was said: "The Government of the United States, recognizing the seriousness of the situation, has lately addressed the Japanese Government, asking it for a prompt dispatch of troops, in order to relieve the position of the Czecho-Slovak forces. In order to meet the wishes of the American Government, and to cooperate with the Allies in this expedition, the Japanese Government has decided to make immediate preparations for the dispatch of the necessary troops. A number of troops will be immediately sent to Vladivostok. Although choosing this course of action the Japanese Government, nevertheless, remains firm in its desire to maintain its friendly relations with Russia and her people, and confirms its declaration of the policy to respect the territorial integrity of Russia and to refrain from interfering in the Russian domestic policy. Furthermore, the Japanese Government declares that after having accomplished the above task it will immediately withdraw its troops from Russian territory." It would appear from this declaration that with the departure of the Czecho-Slovaks the Japanese forces should also have gone. However, in the declaration of the Japanese Government, made on August 13, 1918, only a few days after the solemn declaration of Japan, referred to above, was issued, additional reasons were given to justify the dispatch of Japanese troops; the soviet troops, at the head of which, in accordance with the information which reached Japan, were Austrians and Germans, were a menace to Japan and China. In the declaration of March 31, 1920, at the time when the Czecho-Slovak evacuation had been completed, the new reasons given in the declaration of August 13, 1918, appeared with much greater emphasis. The Czecho-Slovak question became a matter of secondary importance, and the considerations with regard to the alleged menace to Korea and Manchuria, and the fact of Siberia's being close to Japan was brought to the foreground. In this declaration nothing was said definitely about the withdrawal of the Japanese troops after the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovaks. It was stated only that the Japanese troops would be withdrawn from Siberia and Transbaikalia as soon as possible after the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak forces had been completed. At the same time the occupation of the Russian part of Sakhalin was announced on the ground that there were no legally constituted Russian authorities with whom it was possible to negotiate a settlement of the Nikolayevsk affair. The evacuation of the Japanese troops from the Khabarovsk district was announced on September 18, 1920. In the declaration signed by Gen. Oi, the commander in chief of the Japanese forces in Siberia, it was said: "I want to express my sincere wish for an early union of the Russian Far East, which will secure peace and prosperity to the people and will strengthen the friendly, neighborly relations between the Russian and Japanese peoples." The same wish has been repeated in all the statements and declarations of the Imperial Japanese Government and Japanese command made since August, 1918. The constituent assembly wants to sum up the present situation in the following words:

Russian Sakhalin has been occupied. The Maritime Province, occupied by Japanese troops, no longer resembles Russian territory, for the Japanese command is conducting itself as if the Japanese and not the Russians were the masters of that territory. The Maritime Province, under the control of the Japanese, is the only district in the territory of the Far Eastern Republic where the remnants of the criminal counter-revolutionary bands of Semenov are murdering and robbing the peaceful population. In the Maritime Province the Government of the Far Eastern Republic and the district authorities can not control the affairs of the Russian people; they can not ship food, goods, or cars outside of the area occupied by the Japanese troops. The population of other parts of the Far Eastern Republic is therefore suffering from lack of food and clothing. Trains are searched and even cars in which representatives of the Russian authorities are riding are detained, if the Japanese command thinks fit.

The latest notes sent by the Japanese consul general to the authorities of the Maritime Province with regard to fisheries provoke a sad comparison between the actual facts of life and the Japanese declarations. With great pains does the constituent assembly think of the events of April 4 and 5, 1920, and the numerous innocent victims who fell as the result of the Japanese intervention.

The constituent assembly is constrained to state that the presence of the Japanese troops in Siberia, which aggravated the Russian people, was responsible for those events. The representatives of the people of the Russian Far East solemnly declare that any aggressive designs with regard to Japan, Korea, and Manchuria are foreign to the minds of the Russian people. The people of the Russian Far East wish to establish and strengthen peaceful relations and look forward to the resumption of trade relations to the mutual advantage of the two countries. The constituent assembly states with great regret that even the people of those parts of the Russian Far East which have been freed from foreign intervention can not go on with their peaceful labor and can not establish permanent order, because the presence of the Japanese troops in Russian territory rouses their suspicion and makes them uncertain of the future. Notwithstanding all the difficulties and obstacles, the Russian Far East has been united in the Far Eastern Republic. The latter has been declared a democratic State, the foundations of which are the principles of civil right, the direct equal and secret ballot, and the inviolability of private property, both of Russian and foreign citizens residing within its territory. The sovereignty in the Republic belongs to the people, who are firmly convinced that the only solid basis for freedom and independence is peaceful neighborly relationship with other countries.

If we recall that the Czecho-Slovak forces have long since evacuated Siberia, then according to the statements made by the Japanese Government there is no reason why Japanese troops should remain longer in the territory of the Far Eastern Republic. The time has come for the Japanese Government to prove that when sending troops to Russia in 1918 it did not intend by taking advantage of the temporary weak position of the Russian people due to the war, the disorder which followed it, and the revolution to seize Russian territory. A great historical moment has come for the Japanese Government to determine for many years, or even hundreds of years to come, the mutual relations between the two great peoples of Russia and Japan. Expressing the will of the whole of the people of the Russian Far East to free the country from foreign intervention, the constituent assembly emphatically insists upon the evacuation of the Japanese expeditionary forces from the entire territory of the Far Eastern Republic. The constituent assembly believes that the withdrawal of the Japanese troops will be an important factor in reestablishing relations between the Japanese and Russian peoples. The proximity of the two countries, the importance of the Russian Far East to Japanese industry, the immense natural resources which await foreign capital for their development, all are a pledge of the future close and peaceful relations which when the past sad memories are gone and the people return to their ordinary occupations shall exist between Japan and the Far Eastern Republic.

The constituent assembly expresses the hope that in the near future the Japanese Government, having desisted from intervention in Russian affairs, will accord recognition to the Far Eastern Republic and enter into formal relations with it.

For the constituent assembly of the Far Eastern Republic.

APRIL 24, 1921.

MEMORANDUM OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY TO THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT.

To the GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

In the official declaration of the American Government, which was received at Vladivostok on August 5, 1918, it was stated that the United States and Japan were the only countries at the time which were in a position to act in Siberia with sufficient forces even to achieve such a modest task as the one the Government of the United States had put before itself. The Government of the United States proposed, therefore, to the Government of Japan that both countries should send a military force of several thousand men to Vladivostok to cooperate in the occupation of the city, with the view of guarding the rear of the Czecho-Slovak troops, who were advancing eastward. The Japanese Government agreed to that proposal. The Government of the United States declared to the Russian people in a most frank and solemn manner that it did not aim at infringement upon the political sovereignty of Russia; that it did not want to interfere in her domestic affairs, even within those limited areas which the American troops might be forced to occupy; and that it had no intention to encroach upon the integrity of Russian territory at that time or in the future; that the American Government aimed exclusively at helping the Russian people in the manner most acceptable to them in their efforts to regain control of their own affairs, their territory, and their destiny. It was understood that the Japanese Government would issue a similar statement.

The declaration of the American Government established the following facts: That the American troops were landed at Vladivostok to assist the Czecho-Slovaks; that the American Government proposed to the Japanese Government to send its troops into Russian territory and that the former is, therefore, responsible for the further stay of the Japanese troops in the territory of the Far Eastern Republic; that the American Government has solemnly guaranteed its noninterference in the Russian affairs and the inviolability of Russian territory.

Under these conditions America invited Japan to cooperate in the matter of assisting the Czecho-Slovaks. At about the same time (in August), the Japanese Government in its official declaration repeated the above statements. Not going into details of the sad history of the intervention, it is enough to say that at the end of 1919 and at the beginning of 1920 the Allies have one after another withdrawn their troops from Siberia. The last transport of American troops left Vladivostok in March, 1920, and soon after that the remainder of the Czecho-Slovak forces left our country. The Japanese troops have not been withdrawn; Japan has brought out pretext after pretext to justify their stay: Japanese interests in eastern Siberia, the possible menace to Korea and Manchuria and the unsafe conditions menacing the life and property of her citizens. Instead of the evacuation of the Japanese troops we witnessed the events of April 4 and 5, 1920, with all the subsequent results, and in July last Japan occupied the Sakhalin district. The Japanese troops were withdrawn from Transbaikalia and the district around Khabarovsk, while the Maritime Province is still occupied by them. The Maritime Province is now the only place where the criminal counter-revolutionary bands of Semenov are murdering and terrorizing the population. There, as in Sakhalin, the people do not feel themselves any longer the masters of their own land. The Japanese activity in the Maritime Province, specially their interference with the railway affairs, forced the members of the interallied technical board to adopt a resolution asking their respective Governments whether it would be expedient to continue their work in view of the interference of the Japanese command.

The American Government made no statement to the Russian people of the Far East at the time of the departure of the American troops. It is therefore not quite clear to the people of the Russian Far East whether the American Government has achieved the purposes for which it sent troops to Siberia. Does the American Government consider that the allied intervention has come to an end? In the declaration of March 14, 1919, with regard to the establishment of the Inter-Allied Technical Board, it was stated that this arrangement for the board would become invalid as soon as the Allied troops should be recalled from Siberia. The fact of the Inter-Allied Technical Board's remaining in Siberia would indicate that the intervention continues with American participation. The representatives of the Russian people in the Far East are compelled by the present circumstances to request of the American Government an explanation of the following:

(1) Does the United States Government adhere to its declaration of August 5, 1918?

(2) If it does, how does the United States Government explain the continuance of the intervention after the evacuation of the Czecho-Slovak troops?

(3) If it does not adhere to that declaration, when will the United States Government declare with the same solemnity that the intervention has ended?

(4) When will the United States Government, which invited the Japanese Government to a military cooperation in the Russian Far East, require a definite end to be put to the intervention which began in 1918 by that invitation?

In spite of the numerous obstacles which have been put and are being put before the people of the Russian Far East in their efforts to unite, they have found strength enough to achieve their aim. By the will of the entire people of the Russian Far East, without distinction of class or nationality, the constituent assembly has now been convoked on the principles of universal suffrage. The constituent assembly has confirmed the independence of the Russian Far East and the formation of a democratic Far Eastern Republic.

The Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic has recognized the independence of the democratic Far Eastern Republic, and now the constituent assembly, which represents the people and expresses their will, expects the United States of America to accord recognition to the Far Eastern Republic.

For the constituent assembly of the Far Eastern Republic.

APRIL, 1921.

NOTE TO THE JAPANESE MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

On May 20, 1921, the local Russian authorities in Vladivostok received the order to proceed with a search in one of the houses over which the Japanese flag was flying, and which, according to information received, was the headquarters and arsenal of the White Guards. When the agents of the Government and a detachment of militia approached the house a Japanese officer came out and declared that he would not give his permission for a search; that he had Russian lodgers, but that there were no weapons there. When the agents of the Government approached the door the door turned out to be barricaded; the door was broken open and in the first few rooms there were discovered 25 people, White Guards, who were hiding there. Here were also found 25 grenades and pyroxylin. The farther rooms were closed and the Japanese categorically refused to admit to them the agents of the Russian administration. By orders of the Russian authorities the public prosecutor was called to the premises where the search was being made and an official report was drawn up in his presence. At the same time there arrived on the scene a Japanese interpreter, whose conduct was extremely rude and who committed an assault upon the agent of the political State police. A colonel of the Japanese gendarmerie also arrived at the place under search, and he also categorically opposed any search in the closed rooms. The negotiations with the Japanese command lasted from 5 p. m. until late at night, but they did not bring about any results. The Japanese command refused to give the representatives of the Russian administration permission to proceed with the search; it also rejected the proposal to place seals on the closed doors and to place Russian guards in front of them. At 10.30 p. m., the negotiations having as yet led to no results, the Russian authorities informed the Japanese that they would take away the exterior guard, leaving all the responsibility with the Japanese command. On the morning of the following day the command of the Japanese gendarmerie invited the agents of the Russian administration to take part in the search to be made in the house in which such action had not been permitted on the previous day. The Russian authorities answered with a refusal, declaring that they themselves were undertaking searches and arrests of persons who were suspected of criminal doings. In the evening the Japanese command informed the Russian authorities that in the house in which the day before they had discovered the White Guards, as well as 20 grenades and pyroxylin, and where after the intervention of the Japanese gendarmerie the search had been abandoned, the Japanese, in a search effected the following day in the morning, found in the room of a Japanese citizen, who was the owner of the apartment, two machine guns, 20 rifles, and a certain number of cartridges.

On May 21, at 10.40, the detachment of national defense, the escort of the commander of the troops and his general staff, were surrounded by Japanese troops, who demanded that the detachments should be drawn up so that the number of men and weapons might be checked up. The entire staff of the military commander, as well as the division of the people's defense and the escort of the commander were arrested and freed only after several hours.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic, through the ministry of foreign affairs, has repeatedly addressed the Japanese Government, and called its attention to the connection between the Japanese command and the Russian criminal elements, a connection which was compromising the Japanese Government and the Japanese people. The Japanese authorities denied the statements of the Russian authorities, attributing these statements to the insincerity of the Government of the Far Eastern Republic. The occurrence which we refer to at present not only can not be denied in any way but has been even confirmed by the Japanese command. The house over which the Japanese flag was flying was used as a hiding place for criminal elements, who had there organized a conspiracy against the people's government, and who had there a depot for their weapons. The Japanese military command by its actions has made it clear to the population of the Far East that it aids and abets these criminals. Such conduct on the part of the Japanese military command, which has presumed, on foreign territory, not only to support criminal elements by concealing them behind the Japanese flag, but even to arrest the staff of the military commander and to disarm Russian forces struggling against the criminal elements in the name of order and safety of person and property, will hardly aid in strengthening the friendly relations between the Japanese and Russian peoples.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic, as well as the population of the Far Eastern Republic, do not consider the Japanese people responsible for the activities of their command, but they are compelled to declare, as they had already declared many times, that such activities of the Japanese command should be stopped.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic hereby vigorously protests against such interference of the Japanese command with internal Russian affairs, against the indignities to which Russian authorities have been subjected, and the obvious support and assistance extended to the White Guard criminals.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic hopes that this time the Japanese Government will immediately take all the necessary steps to bring about the cessation of such a policy of the Japanese command on the territory of the Far Eastern Republic.

B. SKVIRSKY,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PROTEST TO THE JAPANESE DIPLOMATIC MISSION AGAINST THE INTERRUPTION OF TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.

For three days, May 25, 26, and 27, according to the reports of local authorities, telegraphic communications between Khabarovsk and Vladivostok have been interrupted for the representatives of the Russian authorities, while Japanese telegrams, in code as well as otherwise, addressed to the Japanese mission in Khabarovsk are regularly arriving from Vladivostok.

This latter fact definitely confirms the opinion that the telegraph is in the hands of the Japanese command, which is thus responsible for the fact that the agents of the Government of the Far Eastern Republic are unable to communicate with each other.

Taking into consideration the circumstance that the Government of the Far Eastern Republic never prevented the Japanese command from using the telegraph lines of the Republic for its needs and that, consequently, the exclusive use of these lines by the Japanese command, which is temporarily stationed on the territory of a foreign Government, can not be explained otherwise than as a conscious attempt to break the elementary requirements of international law, the Government of the Far Eastern Republic expresses its vigorous protest against this procedure, and categorically insists upon the immediate reestablishment of normal conditions on the telegraph lines, which means that they must be primarily at the full and unconditional disposal of the lawful authorities of the Far Eastern Republic.

B. SKVIRSKY,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

CHITA, May 27, 1921.

NOTE TO THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT.

On May 21, 1921, the officers of the Russian militia at Vladivostok discovered a band of criminals who had arms stored in the house of a Japanese citizen. The militia officers were unable to arrest that band in view of the forcible and willful interference of the Japanese gendarmerie. The Russian militia had at that time been reliably informed of an antigovernment uprising being organized at Vladivostok. The Japanese command, which was aware of these preparations, not only did not prevent the illegal arming of the criminal elements implicated in the preparations, but, on the contrary, on May 26 the day of the uprising, surrounded the militia and the people's defense guard and required them to surrender their arms, while no measures have been taken against the outlaw bands. Nor did the Japanese command prevent the occupation of the Government establishments by the agents of Semenov, who were set free by the Japanese command. In short, the conduct of the Japanese command at this time has not been different from its conduct on March 30, 1921, when an attempt at a coup in Vladivostok was made.

Elected by a constituent assembly, the Government of the Far Eastern Republic, fulfilling the will of the people, has tried to restore order over the entire territory of the Russian Far East, and to establish friendly relations with all other nations. The Government has adopted every measure to liquidate as early as possible the results of the disorder inherited by it from the bandits of Semenov, who have been condemned by the entire civilized world. Rising against the atrocities of the bands of the Atamans, the population of Transbaikalia, which has experienced all the horrors of Semenov's brutality, armed themselves with home-made spears and scythes and expelled Semenov and his bandits.

The difficult financial and economic position which the people of the Far Eastern Republic are now facing, demands first of all peace both among themselves and with their neighbors, and incessant work of all classes of the population. Acting in accord with the will of the people, the Government of the Far Eastern Republic has first of all tried to bring to an end the civil war. The constituent assembly at Chita, elected on the principles of universal, equal, direct, and secret ballot, has by its energetic work established the fundamental laws of the young Republic, in which the principles of the broadest democracy are expressed, and the Government of the Far Eastern Republic would have been peacefully guided in the matter of democratic reconstruction if it had not been for the constant interference of the Japanese command, which enabled the fleeing bands to take refuge in Chinese territory. The Japanese command has also taken under its protection the bands of Semenov at Grodekovo, and has taken no steps to prevent the flogging of peaceful citizens by the bands or the committing of other forms of violence against the population. At the same time the Japanese command has hindered the work of the people's assembly of the Maritime Province in the matter of dispersing the above band. It is unnecessary to explain and to prove how unfriendly and harmful is such behavior on the part of the Japanese command to the people of the Russian Far East. It is now well known to everybody, as I have been informed by one of the members of the American mission now in Chita, that disorder in the Far Eastern Republic is evident only where there are Japanese troops, and where there are no Japanese troops one feels as safe as in America.

How much the Japanese command is trying to maintain order in the Maritime Province can be judged from the fact that, acting in the above manner, the Japanese command has itself violated the agreement of April 29, 1920—which it forced upon the former Vladivostok Government—in spite of the repeated statements that it is strictly observing this agreement. The Government of the Far Eastern Republic wishes to know by what clause of the agreement of April 29, 1920, the Japanese command has the right to disarm the Russian militia of the Maritime Province.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic can only explain this by an utter confusion on the part of the Japanese command at the moment when the bands which are under its protection tried to commit violence upon the peaceful population and plunder the national property of the Far Eastern Republic. The Government of the Far Eastern Republic explains this by the confusion of the Japanese command, for it can not here admit an evil design, as such would be a crime and would stigmatize the Japanese Government.

Is the Japanese Government unable authoritatively to put an end to such conduct of the Japanese command in the Maritime Province?

Is it the intention of the Japanese Government to tolerate a further complicity of its command with the criminal elements?

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic will be forced to hold the Japanese Government responsible for the conduct of the Japanese command, for it does not believe that the orders of the Imperial Government are ignored by the Japanese command, nor can it admit that the latter is a power independent of the Government.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic sincerely wishes to establish its relations with the Japanese people, not on the basis of the old wrongs committed by the Japanese troops against the Russian people during the intervention, but on the reciprocal readiness of the two countries to establish friendly neighborly relations, based on perfect equality and mutual respect for the rights of each country. Let the Japanese Government make an honest and frank statement before the whole world of its claims in the Russian Far East, as honest and frank as the statement of the people of the Far Eastern Republic of their desire for peace at home and with their neighbors and for the cessation of military intervention.

The Government and the people of the Far Eastern Republic are not only not attempting to evade those questions, but, on the contrary, are trying to bring about an early settlement of them, and they are not to be blamed if the Japanese Government and the Japanese command will not choose the open road. And if uprisings recur and blood is shed let the whole world know that the Japanese command is instigating them by every possible means, and that the Japanese Government is not preventing such activities on the part of the command.

On behalf of the people of the Russian Far East we demand that Japan cease interference with our affairs. The Government of the Far Eastern Republic, on behalf of the entire people of the Russian Far East who elected it, requests from the Japanese people and the Imperial Government of Japan a straightforward and definite answer to each of the following questions:

1. Do the Japanese Government and the Japanese people consider just the constant interference of the Japanese command in Russian affairs against the will of the Russian people of the Far East?

2. Will the Japanese Government continue to help the criminals and the brigands of the bands of Semenov, Ungern, etc., and put obstacles in the way of the authorities of the Far Eastern Republic in their struggle against these bandits?

3. Does the Japanese Government consider it necessary to establish friendly neighborly relations with the Government of the Far Eastern Republic?

4. Does the Japanese Government consider it necessary to protect the interests of the Japanese merchants in the territory of the Far Eastern Republic in the only possible way, namely, to enter into a commercial treaty with the Government of the Far Eastern Republic?

5. Does the Japanese Government intend to withdraw from the territory of the Far Eastern Republic its army of occupation, the presence of which in Russian territory, as has been sufficiently proved during the last three years, has in no way helped to establish friendly relations nor to secure any privileges for Japanese residents, but on the contrary has been the source of a growing hatred toward Japan?

We hope, for the sake of a better understanding between the two peoples, that the Japanese Government will not delay to give straightforward and definite answers to all these questions.

We believe that the Japanese Government will choose a more righteous course in its relations with the Russian people. We firmly believe that a definite end will be put to the shameful policy of usurpation and violence and that the Japanese Government will enter into just, sincere, and friendly relations with the Russian people. The Government of the Far Eastern Republic is convinced that such a settlement of the matter will be to the benefit of the Japanese people. While welcoming the friendly settlement of all outstanding matters, the Government of the Far Eastern Republic demands:

1. A definite statement of the Japanese Government and the Japanese command that it will refrain from supporting the self-styled government of Merkulov at Vladivostok. The Government of the Far Eastern Republic is convinced that this adventure is doomed to failure.

2. The Japanese command shall immediately return all arms to the people's defense guard.

3. The Japanese command shall not prevent the Government officials from making arrests and taking other necessary measures to restore order.

4. The Japanese command shall not put any obstacles in the way of the local authorities of the Far Eastern Republic nor of the district emissary of the Government, Mr. Kozhevnikov, the assistant minister of foreign affairs, who has been ordered to proceed to Vladivostok, in restoring order and protecting the lives of the foreign citizens residing in the territory of the Far Eastern Republic.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic solemnly declares that if the Japanese command does not interfere with the domestic affairs of the Republic, foreigners in the Maritime Province will enjoy absolute safety and the same hospitality as has been accorded them in the territory which has already been freed from the yoke of the intervention.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic, which has been elected by the constituent assembly on behalf of the entire population of the Russian Far East, solemnly declares that no adventures similar to that which occurred at Vladivostok will force the Government to forego its efforts to carry into effect the will of the people as expressed in the fundamental laws of the Republic enacted by the constituent assembly.

The Government will suppress all bandits from whatever quarter they may come and will defend the sovereign rights of the Russian people in the Far East, hoping to have the support of the entire civilized world.

And if the Japanese Government fails to give a straightforward and definite answer to the questions proposed by the people of the Russian Far East, and if it refuses to comply with the lawful demands of the Russian people, the people of the Far East and their Government will not share the responsibility for continuation of the civil war and for the lack of order in the Maritime Province, placing the responsibility upon the Japanese command because of its constant interference with the domestic affairs of the Far Eastern Republic, and the Government and the people of Japan will be held accountable before the entire civilized world.

We are firmly convinced that the Japanese Government will immediately discuss the abnormal conditions with the Government of the Far Eastern Republic and will in cooperating with it arrive at a decision satisfactory to both.

IGNATIUS L. YURIN,
Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Far Eastern Republic.

A NOTE OF THE FAR EASTERN REPUBLIC TO JAPAN.

On November 17 the delegation of the Far Eastern Republic in Dairen submitted the following note of the minister of foreign affairs of the Far Eastern Republic to be delivered to the minister of foreign affairs of Japan with regard to the events in the Maritime Province:

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic, notwithstanding the presence of Japanese occupational troops on the territory of the Far Eastern Republic, decided to start negotiations with the Japanese Government in order to establish friendly relations between the Far Eastern Republic and Japan and to create the possibility of a peaceful industrial and commercial intercourse between the populations of the two countries. By so doing the Government of the Far Eastern Republic assumed that the development of the agricultural life of the population of the Far Eastern Republic will have a favorable effect upon the interests of Japanese trade and industry.

In beginning negotiations in Dairen with the representatives of the Japanese Government, the representatives of the Far Eastern Republic were well aware of the fact that the fundamental obstacle to the attainment of a peaceful intercourse between both countries is the presence of Japanese troops in the Maritime Province and in other parts of the territory of the Far Eastern Republic, as well as the presence in these regions of Russian organizations and armed detachments which are hostile to the Far Eastern Republic and which are constantly receiving support on the part of the Japanese command. The Government of the Far Eastern Republic was convinced that simultaneously with the opening of negotiations between Japan and the Far Eastern Republic in Dairen the Japanese Government will begin the evacuation of its troops from the confines of the Far Eastern Republic and that it will take the necessary steps to prevent the organizations and detachments that are hostile to the Far Eastern Republic from being supported by Japanese troops and their command.

The representatives of the Japanese Government, in the course of the negotiations, declared to the representatives of the Far Eastern Republic that no support would be given in the future by the Japanese military detachments and by the Japanese authorities to the aforesaid insurgent organizations and detachments; but, nevertheless, the Government of the Far Eastern Republic is compelled to state with the greatest regret that this announcement of the representatives of the Japanese Government was not actually put into effect. The Government of the Far Eastern Republic has received quite a number of reports pointing out that at the time when the deliberations on friendly relations and peaceful trade were going on between the representatives of the Far Eastern Republic and Japan, the insurgent organizations in the region where the Japanese troops were stationed continued to avail themselves in their struggle against the Far Eastern Republic of the indirect support of Japanese detachments and of the Japanese authorities.

Already in the middle of September the military authorities delivered weapons to the insurgent White Guard detachments, and in every one of these detachments, during their attacks against the Far Eastern Republic or their punitive expeditions against the local population, there was invariably a number, larger or smaller, of Japanese soldiers taking part, the Japanese sometimes exceeding the number of the Russian White Guards.

Thus, for instance, the attack against the military post of the army of the Far Eastern Republic in the village of Vassianovka, on November 15, was accomplished by 35 soldiers, of whom 33 were Japanese and 2 were Russians, dressed in Japanese uniforms. On November 16, in the region of Vladimiro-Alexandrovsk and Suchan, there occurred a joint advance of Japanese soldiers and Russian insurgents. In addition to such cases of direct support granted by the Japanese authorities to organizations and military detachments that were hostile to the Far Eastern Republic, there were also cases of indirect help. The organization of Russian reactionaries calling itself the Merkulov Government still goes on with the selling out of State and private property of the Far Eastern Republic which they criminally seized in Vladivostok and the surrounding district, and the transactions involved in the sales of these properties, which are concluded with Japanese firms, are indorsed by the Japanese authorities.

The population of the Maritime Province, aroused by these activities of the counter-revolutionary organizations and detachments, is trying to defend its life and property with its own forces. This self-defense, which takes the form of a partisan warfare, often leads to the destruction of the property of the Far Eastern Republic in the Maritime Province, and to armed clashes in this region. In the course of the last month the brutal outrages of the Russian counter-revolutionary organizations acting in the region where the Japanese troops are stationed have reached their height. In Vladivostok and in the surroundings arrests are proceeding of peaceful inhabitants who are not guilty of any crime. The persons arrested are subjected to torments and tortures and are shot by the score without any investigation or legal proceedings. In the month of October occurred the brutal murder of Zeitlin, the representative of the Far Eastern Republic, who was ordered by the Government to go to Vladivostok in order to put a stop to the acts of lawlessness and destruction which were prevalent there. The responsibility for all these lawless acts and atrocities lies not only with the counter-revolutionary organizations of the Vladivostok region, which in their endeavors to put obstacles in the way of the lawful authorities of the Far Eastern Republic do not stop at the most-unheard-of acts of brutality and atrocity. Indirectly the responsibility for them rests with the Japanese military command, and also with the Japanese Government, which, by continuing to keep its troops in this territory, by giving help and support to the counter-revolutionary organizations and detachments on this territory, enables them to commit with impunity all manner of offenses against the Russian population.

In calling attention to the aforesaid facts the Government of the Far Eastern Republic again protests against the acts of violence perpetrated upon the citizens of the Maritime Province, and emphasizes that only then will it be possible to put a stop to these acts of violence and to restore order in the southern part of the Maritime Province when the Japanese military command will cease, directly or indirectly, to support the activities of the Russian counter-revolutionary detachments and organizations, and when the Japanese troops will be withdrawn from the territory of the Far Eastern Republic.

The Government of the Far Eastern Republic believes that the negotiations which are going on in Dairen between the Far Eastern Republic and Japan may be brought to a successful conclusion, and that both negotiating parties may conclude an agreement on peaceful economic relations, if only the Japanese troops are withdrawn from the territory of the Far Eastern Republic, which would be a proof of the sincere intentions of the Japanese Government toward the Far Eastern Republic.

PROTEST OF THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY AGAINST THE ACTIVITIES OF THE JAPANESE.

The national assembly addressed the following appeal to all nations protesting against the Japanese support of Merkulov, Semenov, and Kappel in their recent offensive in the Maritime Province:

The national assembly, which was selected by the entire population of the Russian Far East and which is vested with full power, is compelled once more to lodge a decisive protest against Japanese aggression in the Far East. The aggression has aroused the extreme indignation of the national assembly.

It is now the fourth year that foreign troops have invaded the Russian Far East. The Japanese sword is suppressing the will of the Russian people. We, the elected representatives of the Russian Far East from the Maritime, Sakhalin, Priamur, Amur, Transbaikal, and Pribaikal Provinces, remember very well all stages of the Japanese intervention; all the atrocities committed by the Japanese against the Russian people in the Far East. All the members of the national assembly are ready to testify to the Japanese endeavors to strengthen and continue their intervention by falsehoods, deceits, and atrocities. The Japanese are aiming to seize our territory and turn it into a Japanese colony. We also have in our possession a great number of documents regarding the Japanese schemes to seize our territory.

Japanese troops continue to pour into Vladivostok. Japan controls the entire Russian Pacific coast. The attack against the Japanese troops in Nikolayevsk in 1920 was the result of Japanese provocation. The Japanese are building fortifications, digging trenches, and putting up barbed wire on Russian territory. Russian rivers have been mined by the Japanese. The mouth of the Amur River has been closed to Russian ships and made a base for attacks upon us. In order to extend their occupation, the Japanese have seized Sakhalin and are exercising all the civil and military authority there. They are disposing of forestry, fishing, and mining resources. Russians are prohibited from entering Sakhalin without Japanese permission. Russians are arrested on suspicion of having relations with the legal Russian Government.

By prolonging civil war the Japanese create conditions warranting the continuation of intervention; by ruining the economic life of the Russian Far East they aim to spread their own influence.

The Maritime Provincial Assembly, which was elected by the entire population of the Province, was endeavoring to establish a democratic rule through a constituent assembly, devising means for the unification and pacification of the country, but the Japanese continue their attempts by assisting reactionaries in the coup d'état in Vladivostok and along the Ussuri Railroad.

Contrary to the agreement of April 29, which provided that no armed forces be permitted in the Japanese zone, the Japanese have been allowing and aiding in organizing and maintaining antigovernment forces. This paralyzed the efforts of the Government to restore normal life and frustrated all attempts to eliminate the marauding bands.

On May 29 the Russian militia which was disparched to Nikolsk-Ussurisk was disarmed by the Japanese, who allowed the town to be captured by the Semenovists. The Japanese prevented the search for arms in the house of a Japanese subject on Komarovsky Street and arrested all our armed detachments and the commanding staff. During the coup d'état of May 26 the Japanese disarmed and arrested the Government troops who were resisting the Merkulov rebels.

The seizure of the Maritime Province and the introduction of the rule of Semenov proved that Japan's aggression in the Russian Far East is not objected to by other powers.

At the Dairen conference between Japan and the Far Eastern Republic the Japanese tried to obtain the consent of the Far Eastern Republic that Japanese troops should remain in Siberia, that fortifications of Russian cities be destroyed, and that the Japanese should obtain all concessions in the territory along the Tartar Straits—all of which means loss of Russian sovereignty and dependence on Japan economically and politically. Failing in this, the Japanese rendered assistance to Merkulov in launching an attack for which the Japanese supplied munitions; and the entire responsibility for this attack rests with the Japanese.

The Russian people of the Far East repeatedly protested to the whole world against the Japanese atrocities. We protest against discussion by the Washington conference of questions in which we are vitally interested without our participation. We strongly protest against the continued presence of Japanese troops on Russian territory, which is an encroachment upon our sovereignty and independence.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, unless some Senator desires to discuss the treaty further, I move that the Senate return to legislative session with a view of disposing of the proposed rule, the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate return to legislative session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed legislative business.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think the Chair understands that the unfinished business was laid before the Senate, and is now the pending proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama was recognized.

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall occupy the floor for only a very few minutes, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order, so that there may be no misunderstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LODGE. Under the terms of the legislative session the unfinished business, of course, is before the Senate, because yesterday we took a recess and not an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the unfinished business would automatically come before the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that the Senator wishes to address himself to the rule.

Mr. HEFLIN. I desire to address myself to another subject for about 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the unfinished business, Senate resolution 213, is now before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 213) to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK AT ATLANTA.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the compliment paid to the southerners on this side of the Chamber by the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE]. I recall what a distinguished journalist of New York once said upon this subject. He said:

These southerners possess a keen sense of civic responsibility. They bestow a personal and unremitting attention upon public affairs. The citizen thinks of his citizenship first.

Mr. President, that is a glorious tribute to pay to any people. That is not only true of the southern people; it is true of a great many people in other sections of our great country. There are, however, a few spots in the country where an effort is being made to stifle the truth, to suppress free speech, and to subsidize the press. The manipulation of the currency and credits of the country is being undertaken to the serious hurt and injury of free institutions.

I hold in my hand a telegram from Richard Edmonds, the editor of the Manufacturers' Record, which I send to the desk and ask to have read in my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Regarding distribution by reserve banks of Senator GLASS'S speech, please advise them I have received copy from New York Federal Reserve Bank and other Federal reserve banks of that speech, printed in pamphlet form, the cover page bearing title "Truth about the Federal reserve system," with three paragraphs strongly commending the system, and beneath them begins the announcement that it is the speech of Senator GLASS.

I think, therefore, this speech is being widely distributed by every Federal reserve bank, and the number of letters received causes me to believe that special efforts are being made through distribution of this speech to induce people to criticize everybody who has criticized Federal reserve management.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond has printed and is distributing recent memorial to President Harding of Federal advisory council, in which criticism of Federal reserve system was said to be "incited by the willful misstatements of unscrupulous or ambitious demagogues."

If the Federal reserve system can out of its vast accumulations carry on this kind of propaganda uninterruptedly, it could practically defeat any congressional or senatorial candidates and ultimately subvert the Government itself.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, that telegram comes from a man of unimpeachable integrity, from a man who has devoted the best talents that he possesses—and he is a wonderfully brilliant man—to the welfare of his country.

I have had pending in the Senate now for nearly 10 days a resolution to investigate the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta in connection with the sending out of the speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], referred to by Mr. Edmonds, accompanied by a letter which calls upon the banker to whom that speech was sent to give his impression about that system and about its administration before he read that speech, and then, as I said on yesterday, to give his impression about it after he had read the speech, and inviting him to comment; in other words, "write us just what you think about this situation." I have called the attention of the Senate and of the country, and I expect to continue to do so, in behalf of the American people—whose Government, I repeat, this is—to what is going on by the permission of the Republican Party in power, with a Republican Senate sitting here with 24 majority, and a House with 169 majority, and a President in the White House, and a board subject to be disposed of any day he sees fit, a Federal institution, a bank, one of the 12 banks of the greatest financial system ever inaugurated in any Government in the world, participating in politics, carrying on a political propaganda, writing letters to banks that are dependent upon that bank for accommodations in currency and credits to carry on their business. These banks, Mr. President, are being coerced, or the effort is being made to coerce them, to intimidate or influence them. They do not send out this speech and let the man who receives it read it and throw it in the wastebasket or do what he pleases with it, but they are calling on him for an expression of opinion. They are on the side of Mr. GLASS. They are distributing his speech. They hold the purse strings to the money supply of all those States. These banks must go to them to get their money supply in order to furnish it to the merchants this year and the farmers this year to make a crop in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and other States supplied by that bank.

Here is that bank seeking to stifle a United States Senator who has dared to stand up and denounce their deflation policy and to call attention to the ruin it has wrought in this country.

That is not all, Mr. President. That Federal Reserve Board, in my judgment, has one or more hired agents in this Capitol to represent it through some of the newspapers of this country. I have read articles which led me to believe that, and I do believe it. I have read articles which have gone out from Washington attacking my position which I feel sure were inspired.

I want to read a line from a letter I received from a gentleman down in my section. He says:

The newspapers are writing editorials jumping on you, and one or both of them published excerpts from the speech of Senator GLASS. These papers, in my opinion, were told by somebody connected with the Atlanta bank, or other connection with the Federal Reserve Board, to publish what appeared in those papers. Evidently that bank crowd are trying to harm you all they can. They seem to feel that they are greater than the power that created them, and resent any attempt at regulating or supervising or criticism of the board's management, even by Congress itself.

What did Mr. Edmunds say in that telegram, Mr. President? He said that if they are permitted to do this, they can defeat Members of the House and defeat Members of the Senate who dare, in behalf of the Government itself, in behalf of the American people, to criticize their cruel and criminal conduct. He said not only that, but that they can subvert the Government itself.

Mr. President, we have long known that the uncontrolled and unbridled participation in politics of the money power is a dangerous thing in a free country, and we see here an effort made to cloak this bank, a refusal to investigate it, to condemn its conduct, to remove its officials if they have been guilty of conduct against the best interests of the country.

Senators on the other side have the power. They can permit this investigation or not; but I intend to bring to the attention of the Senate each day the facts concerning this matter. It is too vital and too important not to do that. Later on I shall ask for an investigation of the publicity fund at the disposal of the Federal Reserve Board. It was charged by the president of the American Cotton Association, in his testimony before the investigating committee of the House and Senate, before which Gov. Harding appeared, that there was a publicity fund, and he wanted an investigation made so as to find out, under oath, to whom these Federal reserve members have paid money, and to what papers that money has gone. That is a very important matter.

It does happen that in two towns where there are Federal reserve banks editorials have appeared in papers attacking my position on the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. Why is that? The local Federal reserve bank has reached out and touched the influence near by and said, "You ought to condemn HEFLIN'S position," and editorials are being published attacking my position, but my position is correct. I am right. In a speech which I had printed in the RECORD yesterday I set out facts taken from the record, many of them furnished me by John Skelton Williams, former Comptroller of the Currency, showing that this board's deflation policy was a deadly and a murderous one. I do not blame them for trying to escape now, to whitewash the situation, and say they were not responsible, deny that they were the ones who inspired that deflation policy; but I would be a coward, knowing the truth as I do, if I should fail to bring it to the attention of the Congress and the country.

I am undertaking to do that, and every effort is being made to suppress the truth. We hear talk about free speech and a free press. They have bought a good portion of the press. Day after day things transpire in this Chamber which we never see a line of in the big daily papers.

I received a letter from a distinguished citizen in New York in which he said:

> I see where you charged upon the floor of the Senate that a bank operating under Government authority was distributing a speech of one Senator assailing another and that they were writing out letters with it.

He said, further:

> This is a very grave thing, and I went and looked through the papers of New York and I never found a line about it in one of them.

He said, "Something is wrong. They are trying to control the press, too."

Mr. President, if any banking power can manipulate the press and keep the truth from going to the country and if they can criticize a Member of this body or of the other body and frighten Senators and Representatives away from their duty by the power which they possess, and by a threat of their active participation in politics, what chance is there for those who want to fight these things?

As long as I am a Senator in this body I shall fight for this country being kept true to the course which the fathers intended it should follow. I do not intend to fold my arms and surrender while I am trusted by the great people who commissioned me to come here. I do not care that some of the newspapers do not publish what I say. They are not bothering me personally. It is ten thousand times easier for me to sit down and do nothing and be quiet, as far as my personal comfort is concerned. I am fighting a battle. I am condemning a wrong. I am doing my duty as an American patriot. I am trying to serve my country, and when they keep this news out of the papers, they are yielding to a power which will crush their offspring in the years to come. That is what they are guilty of doing.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I personally am very deeply interested in the discussion of the Senator. I only regret that more are not here to hear his discussion of this most important question. I would say that I voted with the Senator as to the reference of his resolution, and I feel that his position is very sound.

Mr. HEFLIN. I remember the Senator voted that way, and I appreciate the Senator's vote.

Mr. FRANCE. I was going to suggest that as we have a small attendance here, it might be desirable to have a quorum.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would rather the Senator would not make a point of no quorum, because I shall finish in a moment.

Mr. FRANCE. I was about to suggest to the Senator that I hope he will pursue this discussion, because I realize it is a very large subject, and I hope he will take it up to-morrow or Monday and give us a statement of all the facts in connection with it. I think a number of Senators desire to take up this question of the new rules. I do not wish to be put in the position of seeming to desire to interrupt the Senator, but it had occurred to me that if this rule is disposed of, then it might be possible to get a quorum of Senators here to hear this very important discussion by the eloquent Senator, who has brought forward what I consider to be one of the great issues now before the country.

Mr. HEFLIN. There is no doubt about that, let me say to the Senator. A Member of this body came to me day before yesterday and said, "The highbrows are trying to stifle you and to shut your mouth; but the people back in my State are writing me that you are right, and that I ought to back you up."

Mr. President, I want to assure my friend from Maryland that there is no doubt about my keeping up the fight, if God gives me the strength to battle. I said here a few days ago that Mr. William Boyce Thompson, treasurer of the Republican National Committee in 1920, borrowed $5,000,000 from the Federal reserve bank in New York, and that he was a trustee, I believe, of that bank. The papers just grabbed it up and said that he denied it, and that I should not have made the statement. I send a statement to the Secretary's desk and ask to have it read, beginning with the words "I have not seen."

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to ask the Senator if he will not permit it all to be read?

Mr. HEFLIN. I just want that part of it read, because the other does not pertain to the issue. It is a statement published a day or two ago in the Baltimore Sun.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

> I have not seen and did not hear Senator HEFLIN'S speech in the Senate to which you refer, but I think it extremely probable that the foundation for such statement he may have made on this subject and which, apparently, has been misinterpreted or distorted in the press, was the transaction or transactions referred to by me in an article on the "Administration of the Federal reserve system," printed in Commerce and Finance of New York, September 21, 1921, in which I said plainly:
> "Not only were the funds of the Federal reserve system extensively loaned to banks whose executive officers and directors were big borrowers, but the records show that one of the banks borrowing most heavily from its reserve bank was lending last autumn to a certain large borrower, who at that very time was also a director of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, over $5,000,000 (including a dummy loan of over $3,000,000)—mostly on highly speculative securities, while farmers and the "country" banks were even then begging for relief and enduring ruinous losses because of the credit restrictions of the reserve system."
> I stand by the absolute accuracy of that statement, and if Col. Thompson or any responsible official of the Federal reserve bank, or any other responsible person, undertakes to deny it, I am prepared to prove it.

Mr. HEFLIN. That statement is from John Skelton Williams. Let the Secretary continue.

The Assistant Secretary continued the reading, as follows:

> That statement was substantially repeated in my letter to Senator OVERMAN of December 2, 1921, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In that letter I also said:
> "And the records show that a bank to which the Federal Reserve Bank of New York was loaning at one time about $100,000,000 was furnishing funds with which to engineer a notorious "corner" on the New York Stock Exchange, in which corner the president and two vice presidents of the bank which was enjoying these huge accommodations from the New York Reserve Bank were largely interested financially."
> These charges were made openly and specifically, and they referred to abuses which, in my opinion, can not be excused or justified. Commenting upon them in my letter to Senator OVERMAN, I said, very frankly:
> "Such evils as these can best be cured, or their recurrence prevented, by the sunlight of publicity rather than the Lethean ointment of secrecy and oblivion."
> I also commend to your consideration the following statement, which you will find in my letter to Senator OVERMAN, above referred to:
> "I ask attention to the important fact that not a single one of the many serious criticisms and charges which it has been my unpleasant duty in behalf of our Federal reserve system and in the public interest to make against the administration of the reserve system has ever been refuted. They stand unshaken and unshakable.

The country is indebted to Senator HEFLIN for the courage and force with which he has exposed and combated the mismanagement of our Federal reserve system. His criticisms and mine have been directed not against the system itself, which both Senator HEFLIN and myself regard as probably the most important and constructive piece of financial legislation enacted in a hundred years, but against the maladministration of that system by men who have signally failed to live up to their great responsibilities.

Your editorial to which I have referred does an injustice both to Senator HEFLIN and myself, and I trust that you will publish this letter in your columns.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS.

RICHMOND, VA., February 18.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I had that statement read from this great Virginian because the day that I made the speech what I said was misrepresented or misunderstood and misinterpreted by those who sent it out from the Capital. The newspapers did not wait to consult me or ask me exactly what it was that I said upon the subject, but seized upon the statement and reported to Mr. Thompson that I had said he borrowed $5,000,000 from the Federal reserve bank. Of course, an individual can not borrow from a Federal reserve bank. He borrowed the money through a member bank. He was a director, as I stated my understanding was, in both, and that two or three million dollars of that amount was borrowed on a dummy note. John Skelton Williams sets out that the statement is correct, and he challenges Mr. Thompson or anybody else who denies it, and offers to produce the proof.

I bring that to the attention of the Senate and the country to show how eager are those who want to stop this discussion, who want the truth kept away from the public in order that some other time this feast may be had again, that the American people may be pillaged and plundered again and again without ever knowing who it is that smites them down and robs them.

Mr. President, I have said frequently that the money which was obtained through the deflation policy flowed to Wall Street. The South and the West lost millions of dollars. Wall Street gained. I have undertaken to show how this thing was done and what ruin it wrought. Not only have I been misrepresented in newspapers, but they have stated that I attacked the system. I have spoken in this Chamber some thirty times, first and last, upon this subject. I challenge any man to show one line where I have ever criticized the Federal reserve system. On the other hand, I have praised the system, but I have denounced those who perverted it from the ends of its institution, and I used the expression that when Christ drove the money changers out of the temple at Jerusalem he was not attacking the temple, he was trying to preserve the temple, but he lashed those out who perverted it from the ends of its institution.

When I condemn the Federal Reserve Board and its mismanagement that brought about the suffering, the distress, and the ruin financially of millions of people I am not attacking the system. I am trying to save the system that it may serve the American people as it did before it was perverted from the ends of its institution. I am trying to preserve the system, but I am condemning those who wrought this ruin through that system—who turned this great instrumentality for good into an instrument of evil—of great injury to the country.

I promised at the outset, owing to the state of the program upon the calendar, that I would speak only a very few moments. I wanted to say this much to-day: Thank God, there is one record from which they can not keep this truth, and that is the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, published each day, which goes out into the districts of 435 Members of the House, into the 48 States of the Union, distributed by Senators, and somebody can get the exact truth of what occurs in this Chamber. I want to continue to bring to the attention of the Senate and of the country the dangerous way in which the country is drifting. Senators, if we permit them to buy up and hog-tie the press and then permit them to intimidate and coerce timid men in either branch of Congress, men who love ease, and who would rather move along the lines of least resistance than to stand for what is right, then we have not a free country, or we will not have very long. I would dislike to have it said of my party that when we were in power these instrumentalities were taken away from the people and transferred to a favored few, who used them to the hurt and injury of my country.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the first amendment reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Heflin	Myers	Shortridge
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Nelson	Simmons
Broussard	Johnson	New	Smith
Cameron	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Spencer
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Stanfield
Caraway	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Culberson	Kendrick	Oddie	Swanson
Cummins	King	Overman	Townsend
Dial	Ladd	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	Lenroot	Pepper	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Lodge	Phipps	Warren
Glass	McCormick	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Gooding	McKellar	Pomerene	Williams
Hale	McKinley	Rawson	Willis
Harris	McNary	Reed
Harrison	Moses	Sheppard

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, several days ago the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] placed in the RECORD a letter from Secretary Hoover. This letter was written to the Senator from Ohio by Secretary Hoover in response to some remarks I made in the Senate, in the course of which I read into the RECORD some newspaper statements as to the position of Secretary Hoover on the Sherman antitrust law as it applies to business corporations. While it is not of very great importance, I think I ought to call attention to the letter which was placed in the RECORD because I think the letter undertakes to place me in a false attitude as regards Mr. Hoover's position.

Certainly, Mr. President, I had then and have now no desire whatever to place Mr. Hoover in a false light or to give any interpretation to his words that should not be given by a fair and an honest consideration. Again, it is just a little bit queer to me that if I had misrepresented the Secretary, he should write a letter to the Senator from Ohio and tell him about it when he probably knew my address just as well as he did the address of the Senator from Ohio. I certainly would have been glad, if I had placed him in a false attitude or misrepresented him, to have made any correction that he desired to have made.

I quoted Mr. Hoover from a newspaper, and the particular newspaper which I used was the Washington Herald. I understood, though I do not know whether that understanding was right, that not long ago and perhaps now Mr. Hoover was one of the owners of that publication. Whether that be true or not, the publication, as everybody knows, is very friendly to him and would not misrepresent him intentionally. I believe that a fair consideration of what I quoted from the Herald compared with what Mr. Hoover inserted in his letter to the Senator from Ohio will show that he was not misrepresented; that, in the first place, the Herald did not misrepresent him and what the Herald printed was a fair synopsis of his letter. Of course, when I quoted from the Herald I gave a fair synopsis of the letter; but, Mr. President, in the letter to the Senator from Ohio Secretary Hoover inclosed the entire correspondence between himself and the Attorney General on the question of monopoly and what the existing law is. In that letter to the Senator from Ohio Secretary Hoover says:

> Senator NORRIS's quotations were from condensed newspaper statements and are an absolute distortion of the basis and intent of this correspondence.

I quoted from newspaper statements that were somewhat condensed, it is true. I contend, however, that the statement of the newspapers, as I have before stated, was a fair statement. At the time I made the quotation the newspaper statement was the only one that I had, and, so far as I knew, it was the only publicity that was given to Secretary Hoover's letter.

The fact that it was a fair statement and considered to be a fair and honest statement of his position by Mr. Hoover himself, I think, may be inferred from the circumstances that he never corrected it. The full purport of his letter was not at that time, so far as I know, published by any newspaper. However, Mr. President, I am to-day going to quote from Mr. Hoover's letter. I have before me the original correspondence in full which was given out by Mr. Hoover to the newspapers. I have very carefully compared it with the letter of Mr. Hoover to the Attorney General which was inclosed in the letter to the Senator from Ohio and which was printed in the RECORD, and there is no deviation whatever between the two. The publication in the RECORD is an absolute copy, of course, of the original letter, as one would expect it to be, both documents having originated with Mr. Hoover himself. The letter is very lengthy and is already printed in the RECORD of the 20th day of February. I shall not read all of the letter. Of course, there are portions of it with which I do not find fault; in fact, I am not finding fault with any of it. I concede that Mr. Hoover has a right to place any construction he may desire upon the meaning of the Sherman antitrust law. I freely concede that. I contended, however, when I first called attention to the matter, and I again call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that if Secretary Hoover's position is right, then the Sherman antitrust law, so far as big business is concerned, is a nullity and might just as well be wiped off the statute books.

Mr. NELSON. Congress wiped it off the statute books so far as labor organizations and farmers' cooperative marketing organizations are concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. The law was never enacted to cover labor organizations; and we passed, the other day, a law permitting farmers to organize, which is now demonstrated to have been a wise act, because even those who are called upon on the part of the Government to enforce the law are themselves putting a construction on it which would permit any monopoly to escape if it put the right kind of a notice over its front office door. One of the questions asked, being No. 4, is as follows:

(4) May a trade association collect credit information as to the financial responsibility, business reputation, and standing of those using the products of the industry; and may the association furnish such information to individual members upon request therefor, provided such information is not used by the association or the members for the purpose of unlawfully establishing so-called "blacklists"?

I wish to read these questions separately, and then I will comment on all of them. Question No. 8 reads:

(8) May a trade association, in cooperation with its members and acting for and in behalf of its members, handle all legislative questions that may affect the particular industry, regarding factories, trades, tariff, taxes, transportation, employers' liability, and workmen's compensation, as well as the handling of rate litigation and railroad transportation questions?

* * * * * * *

(10) A. May a trade association collect statistics from each member, showing his volume of production, his capacity to produce, the wages paid, the consumption of his product in domestic or foreign trade, and his distribution thereof, specifying the volume of distribution by districts, together with his stock, wholesale or retail?

B. And may such trade association, on receipt of the individual reports of each member, compile the information in each report into a consolidated statement which shows the total volume of production of the membership; its capacity to produce by districts of production, which in some instances include a State or less area; the wages by districts of production; the consumption in foreign or domestic trade by districts; the volume of distribution by districts; and the stocks on hand, wholesale and retail, by districts?

C. And if, after compiling the information as aforesaid, the information received from the members as well as the combined information is not given by the association to any other person, may it then file the combined statement with the Secretary of Commerce for distribution by him to the members of the association through the public press or otherwise and to the public generally and to all persons who may be in any way interested in the product of the industry, it being understood that the individual reports for the members should cover either weekly, monthly, quarterly, or longer periods, as may be deemed desirable by the members, and, when a period is adopted, the report for each member shall cover that period and the combined report shall be for that period?

(11) A. May a trade association at the time it collects the production and distribution statistics above outlined at the same time have their members report the prices they have received for the products they have sold during the period taken, specifying the volume of each grade, brand, size, style, or quality, as the case may be, and the price received for the volume so sold in each of the respective districts where the product is sold?

B. And may the association, without making known to any person the individual price reports of any member, consolidate all of the reports into one and show the average price received for the total volume of each grade, brand, size, style, or quality, as the case may be, distributed in each district covered by the distribution statistics for the period covered by each individual report?

C. And may the association, after making such compilation, send the compiled report as to average price, as aforesaid, to the Secretary of Commerce, to be by him distributed to the public and to any or all persons who may be interested in the particular industry making the report?

Mr. President, not long ago the Supreme Court, in the case of the American Column and Lumber Co. et al., appellants, v. The United States, rendered a decision which, in my judgment, throws a great deal of light upon the particular activities of business corporations and institutions such as are outlined by Mr. Hoover, and which would not under his idea of the Sherman antitrust law constitute monopolies or restraints of trade in violation of law.

I wish to read a portion of the opinion of the Supreme Court in that case. Very many of the practices which are condemned by the Supreme Court in that opinion are almost identical with those that are set out by Mr. Hoover as being proper. I wish the Senate and the country could realize the difference between Mr. Hoover and the Supreme Court on this particular question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope that before the Senator concludes he will call attention to the fact that the plan followed by the lumber company was what was known as the Eddy plan, which has been adopted by a large number of business associations in the United States, as a result of which there have been built up monopolies and conspiracies in restraint of trade and trusts that ramify practically all of the industries of the United States and are largely responsible for the high prices, the high cost of living, and the impaired business conditions in the United States to-day. If the Attorney General would bring suits against those combinations, as one was brought against the lumber company, he would be doing a very great service to the American people.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator, and I think he has made a statement which is borne out entirely by the facts in the case.

Mr. President, the decision of the Supreme Court is very long, and I am not going to weary the Senate by reading very much of it. The court is discussing a combination that was very similar, as I have said, to some of those that are outlined by Mr. Hoover as being permissible under the law. It is shown in the opinion, as will be seen as I read it, just what kind of a combination it was, and the opinion shows on its face the similarity between it and those outlined by Mr. Hoover as being permissible. The Supreme Court says:

Such close cooperation between many persons, firms, and corporations controlling a large volume of interstate commerce as is provided for in this plan is plainly in theory, as it proved to be in fact, inconsistent with that free and unrestricted trade which the statute contemplates shall be maintained, and that persons conducting the association fully realized this is apparent from their protesting so often as they did, in many of their confidential communications appearing in this record, that their purposes were not unlawful; that they sought only to supplant cutthroat competition with what in their own judgment would be "fair and reasonable competition," and to obtain, not make, fair prices, and by their repeated insistence that the Sherman law "designed to prevent the restraint of trade is itself one of the greatest restrainers of trade, and should be repealed." To call the activities of the defendants, as they are proved in this record, an "open-competition plan" of action is plainly a misleading misnomer.

Genuine competitors do not make daily, weekly, and monthly reports of the minutest details of their business to their rivals, as the defendants did; they do not contract, as was done here, to submit their books to the discretionary audit and their stocks to the discretionary inspection of their rivals for the purpose of successfully competing with them, and they do not submit the details of their business to the analysis of an expert, jointly employed, and obtain from him a "harmonized" estimate of the market as it is and as, in his specially and confidentially informed judgment, it promises to be. This is not the conduct of competitors, but is so clearly that of men united in an agreement, express or implied, to act together and pursue a common purpose under a common guide that, if it did not stand confessed a combination to restrict production and increase prices in interstate commerce and as, therefore, a direct restraint upon that commerce, as we have seen that it is, that conclusion must inevitably have been inferred from the facts which were proved. To pronounce such abnormal conduct on the part of 365 natural competitors, controlling one-third of the trade of the country in an article of prime necessity, a "new form of competition" and not an old form of combination in restraint of trade, as it so plainly is, would be for this court to confess itself blinded by words and forms to realities which men in general very plainly see and understand and condemn as an old evil in a new dress and with a new name.

The "plan" is, essentially, simply an expansion of the gentlemen's agreement of former days, skillfully devised to evade the law. To call it open competition because the meetings were nominally open to the public, or because some voluminous reports were transmitted to the Department of Justice, or because no specific agreement to restrict trade or fix prices is proved, can not conceal the fact that the fundamental purpose of the "plan" was to procure "harmonious" individual action among a large number of naturally competing dealers with respect to the volume of production and prices, without having any specific agreement with respect to them, and to rely for maintenance of concerted action in both respects not upon fines and forfeitures as in earlier days but upon what experience has shown to be the more potent and dependable restraints, of business honor and social penalties—cautiously reinforced by many and elaborate reports, which would promptly expose to his associates any disposition in any member to deviate from the tacit understanding that all were to act together under the subtle direction of a single interpreter of their common purposes, as evidenced in the minute reports of what they had done and in their expressed purposes as to what they intended to do.

Mr. President, one of the things proposed by Mr. Hoover is that business concerns engaged in the same business shall, through some joint instrumentality, make inquiry as to the financial standing of people who buy the products dealt in by these various concerns, and report that financial standing for the action of all the members of this combination, expressly stating, however, that that information must not be used to make a black list. What is the object of it except to make a black list? What object can it have? What purpose can it be used for, except to further the aims of a monopoly and a combination? The fact that you say, "We are not going to use it for that purpose," when it can be valuable for no other purpose, is, as I think the Supreme Court fairly says, in effect a confession of the very thing that must inevitably follow from the nature of the combination itself.

According to Mr. Hoover, it is all right, if the monopoly says, "We are a monopoly; we are getting this information for our common good, but we will put a sign over the front door which will say, 'We are philanthropists, nevertheless. We love the producer, and we admire the consumer. We are not going to hurt either one of them. We are just getting this information for fun, or for some other purpose.'" The fact that the only use that such information can have to men who are engaged in competition is to do away absolutely with the competition and form a monopoly is sufficient proof that there is no other excuse for its existence.

Mr. President, however much he may deny it, the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, has overruled the Supreme Court; and if his word goes in business concerns the Supreme Court might just as well take it all back, and Congress might just as well repeal the law.

That is not saying that a man may not argue, and Mr. Hoover may, and I am not complaining of the man who does, that it is better to have a monopoly, and then to regulate the monopoly. That is not the theory of our law, however. The theory of the Sherman antitrust law was to retain competition; and as long as we want to retain competition we must prohibit the organization and carrying out of such plans as are outlined by Mr. Hoover to the Attorney General. If we want to have monopolies, then we must take the other horn of the dilemma and regulate them, and have prices fixed, and so on, by somebody who is not directly interested on either side of the matter.

Mr. President, I felt that I ought to say this much, and ought to put in the RECORD, side by side with Mr. Hoover's plan, the judgment rendered by the Supreme Court.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate, so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, some assertions have been made about the seeking of power on the part of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the members of that committee; and there has been an attempt—probably thoughtless—to present this matter as if it were an ambition of the Commitee on Appropriations to assume the duties of other committees, and to get great control.

Nothing could be further from the truth than that. The Appropriations Committee has not sought to usurp the duties of other committees. The committee has gone along as provided by the rules until it has been forced to come for relief to the Committee on Rules, because of legislation which both parties asked for and in which both parties joined—that of the creation of the budget.

Mr. President, the budget has been asked for by both political parties in party platforms and elsewhere, by municipalities, States, and business generally; and wherever the budget is in force there is but one source from which they receive all the information as to the amount of money that can be collected and expended, and but one final agency where it is at last definitely decided as to how much shall be appropriated, and how it shall be appropriated or apportioned. In other words, both parties could not have failed to understand when they adopted the idea of the budget that they must do as was formerly done by the Congress—that is, confine the appropriations to one committee in each body.

It was well understood by those who advocated the Budget. It might be well enough here to ask the Secretary to read a little item in the platform of the Democratic Party, adopted at its last convention, which is quite to the point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

BUDGET.

In the interest of economy and good administration, we favor the creation of an effective budget system that will function in accord with the principles of the Constitution. The reform should reach both the executive and legislative aspects of the question. The supervision and preparation of the budget should be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury as the representative of the President. The budget, as such, should not be increased by the Congress except by a two-thirds vote, each House, however, being free to exercise its constitutional privilege of making appropriations through independent bills. The appropriation bills should be considered by single committees of the House and Senate. The audit system should be consolidated and its powers expanded so as to pass upon the wisdom of, as well as the authority for, expenditures.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there were many persons, and among them several Senators on the Appropriations Committee, who had some hesitancy about approving and supporting this budget law, believing that it would be hard to proceed under its provisions. I know, so far as I am concerned, that I was willing to be taught what better plans we could have to improve our old system, and I made no resistance to the budget. I was very doubtful, at the time, what would be the effect of it; but now, after having the budget in full force so far as the estimates are concerned, I very much believe—in fact, I feel convinced—that it can be made successful if we do not turn back on the way, and undertake to perform our duties half in the budget and half outside, as we would be doing unless we should follow the plans which have been adopted by the House and those which have been recommended for the Senate.

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] yesterday spoke of confusion in the House, as if there were confusion on account of the handling of all appropriation bills by one committee. Let me say to that Senator that that does not prevail. It prevailed to some extent last year; and why? The Budget bill was passed and sent to the President. The House, in preparation for it, proceeded to resolve the system of appropriations, in the general line of the Budget, into one committee; but the President of the United States vetoed the Budget bill because of an obnoxious provision in it to which he was not willing to agree, and the Budget bill did not become law until the following year. Hence, when the committee of the House a year ago started to make up their bills, they had the old estimates only, and did not have in any way the work of the Budget.

The consequence was that there was complaint from all sides. There was complaint for the time being from those who had not been taken into the committee. There was complaint because the changes in the estimates and calculations of the Budget system had not been adopted.

After the Budget act was signed, a year or more later, the House took up the matter directly from the President, as the Budget indicated it should be done—that is, there was a new distribution, classification, and arrangement of the items of appropriation under different heads and under different aggregations, so that one seeking to find how appropriations could be expended throughout the departments and elsewhere would find the various items in their appropriate places.

It is no secret that the Committee on Appropriations in the House, with the House behind it, attempted to find whether all the items should be put in one appropriation bill, very much the same as is done in States and other places. But that hardly seemed to be tenable, at least at present, so another schedule of bills was adopted, the schedule advocated by the Bureau of the Budget, and those bills have been put together and sent to us.

My vigilant friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], if he has examined the record as he usually does, will have to admit here and now that, so far as the appropriation bills of this year under the Budget are concerned, there has been less confusion, there has been less misunderstanding, there has been greater pleasure in the House in passing those bills than ever before, and they have come to us in better shape.

The situation was like this: The Senate Committee on Appropriations would have but two appropriation bills, all told, referred to it if the desk should undertake to refer the appropriation bills by title. There were only two that were titled so that they could be sent to that committee. The Chair, of course, would be in doubt, and others would be in doubt. On the other hand, there were six or seven of those bills which were so titled that they could not go to any other committee, and in that situation we were compelled to appeal to the Rules Commitee of the Senate for relief as to all these matters, pursuing what has been asked not only by the parties in their platforms but by the business world generally and by the last three Presidents of the United States. I send to the desk and ask to have read one part of one of President Wilson's messages.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

President Wilson, in his message to Congress in 1919, said:

"I hope that Congress will bring to a conclusion at this session legislation looking to the establishment of a budget system. That there should be one single authority responsible for the making of all appropriations and that appropriations should be made not independently of each other, but with reference to one single comprehensive plan of expenditure properly related to the Nation's income, there can be no doubt. I believe the burden of preparing the budget must, in the nature of the case, if the work is to be properly done and responsibility concentrated instead of divided, rest upon the Executive. The budget so prepared should be submitted to and approved or amended by a single committee of each House of Congress, and no single appropriation should be made by the Congress, except such as may have been included in the budget prepared by the Executive or added by the particular committee of Congress charged with the budget legislation."

Mr. WARREN. There is more along the same line, and other messages of President Wilson covered the same ground. Nor was President Wilson alone in that. President Harding, and before both of those, President Taft, maintained that position always, as, for that matter, had so many, many scores of Members of the House and Senate of long and brilliant service, men who had served on the Committee on Appropriations, and very many who had not served on that committee. It has been a common belief. It was stated, when the committees were divided 25 years ago, that that would lead to extravagance. There were similar statements made at various times. I remember that the chairman of the Committee on Finance, Mr. Aldrich, said the doubling up and the pyramiding of the expenses of the Government would cost $300,000,000 a year.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. I remember having read a long time ago Senator Aldrich's statement about the Government costing $300,000,000 a year more than it should cost. I did not understand then, and I did not until the Senator from Wyoming alluded to it, suppose that Senator Aldrich had in mind the method of appropriating. I thought he referred to the duplication of service and the innumerable activities of the Government which were not necessary, some of which were duplications of others. The concentration of appropriations in the hands of one committee would not remedy that at all, would it?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly it would, or should.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought this committee was to have no legislative functions at all, and those activities are the results of legislation.

Mr. WARREN. But they have to be appropriated for, just the same, and if they are duplications it could be brought back to the Senate and the House at once that they were duplications, whereas now the duplications go on.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought that was what this reclassification committee was to take care of.

Mr. WARREN. The reclassification committee has nothing whatever to do with that.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought it was going to inform us as to what activities were duplications.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not mean the reclassification committee; he must mean the joint committee of the House and Senate which is supposed to see what independent services or what departments can be dropped or joined to others—the joint committee on the reorganization of the administrative branch of the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would like to cite an example. When the Appropriations Committee was considering the legislative bill during one session of Congress we appropriated for clerks in departments and gave what we thought the necessities demanded and the law allowed. We found soon after that there was a bill pending before the Committee on Pensions under which the department would get other clerks. They went before the Pensions Committee and got all they wanted, and there were two bills giving them all these clerks, some of whom they did not need. There was a duplication.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I suggest that this committee can not cut off a clerkship and can not add one, can it?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not without legislation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then it could not effect any such reform as is suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, could it?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why could not the Committee on Pensions say, "What is the necessity of putting those clerks on, when the Appropriations Committee has already provided for them in another bill?" It is a duplication.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did they attempt to hire additional clerks?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Under the statutory-roll system they can not add to or decrease the number of the clerks by the appropriations.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is done time and again.

Mr. WARREN. The matter of the lump-sum appropriations which are divided among the departments is a pretty broad question. Appointment of clerks can be made under such appropriations.

But to come back to the point I was discussing. There seems to be a disposition on the part of my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], as he did yesterday, to appeal directly by name to Senators who serve on different committees, telling how it would affect them. If those Senators who may have come into the Senate in later years, and who are farther from the top of the committees than they would wish to be, who have not had long service and experience, are going to view this entirely from a selfish standpoint, desiring to serve upon a certain committee and desiring that committee to appropriate without regard to what other committees are doing, that is a line of appeal I do not care to follow up. I myself, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and, so far as I know, the members of that committee seek some reform. We seek to follow the reform which has already been inaugurated, and which we feel compelled to follow for the good of this country at large.

I have stated as plainly as words can make it that so far as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, he is entirely ready to step aside if some man better fitted can take up the work. So far as that is concerned, if we do not take a patriotic, loyal, American view in support of our Government—if it is to be entirely a matter of little personal pride for the time being to individual Senators to serve on some particular appropriating committee—then, of course, the Budget system will be a failure; there is no question about that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator said it was an unfair argument to appeal to Senators' individual positions.

Mr. WARREN. I did not say it was unfair.

Mr. HARRISON. I apologize for the word. The facts are—and I am wondering if the Senator has investigated it—that there are 64 Senators who are now on one or more committees which make appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Very likely.

Mr. HARRISON. They will be affected by this proposed change in the rules and will be on no committee which appropriates. Is it not a matter for consideration when 64 Senators are going to turn over to one-third of the Senate the matter of making all of the appropriations made by the Congress?

Mr. WARREN. If we look at it from the viewpoint of one of the 64 as to some independent item of appropriations by which he may be profited, the Senator's point may be well taken; but it is a pretty narrow construction.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not a narrow construction, for on the Commerce Committee, for instance, who believe that the rivers and harbors of this country should be adequately provided for and reasonable appropriations made, to vote against a proposed change in the rules which would take the power of recommending appropriations from that committee, composed of liberal-minded men in favor of river and harbor appropriations, and put it into the hands of a committee who would be for squeezing the very life out of those appropriations and cutting them to the bone. The same thing would apply to agriculture; it might apply to Indian affairs; and it might apply to many other propositions which are appropriated for by Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the matter of the rivers and harbors appropriations or of Indian appropriations does not lie at my door. That has already been settled by the practice which has done away with such bills. The rivers and harbors appropriations will go to the Committee on Military Affairs, and they will have the assistance of a subcommittee from the Committee on Commerce. The Senator from Mississippi must know that as to appropriation bills generally—though it may not be true of all—they are taken up first by a subcommittee composed of three or five Senators, who labor over the estimates, who take the amendments offered by Senators, and who decide finally upon what they believe would be a proper bill for the committee to report. It then goes before the full committee, and the full committee has a chance to alter it. Then it comes to the Senate, and under the rules it is open to every Senator to offer amendments to increase or decrease the amount. The power is always in the Senate finally.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. In presenting this matter, the Senator said it is merely to care for a situation which has arisen in the House, they having one committee there, and that the bills as they come here can not be separated, that it is necessary to refer them to one committee; that it is not for the purpose of getting more power for the Appropriations Committee. Would not the Senator be willing to agree to a substitute providing that as these bills come from the House they shall be referred to the Appropriations Committee, but that the provisions in the bill affecting agriculture, which I take as an illustration, be referred to a subcommittee of three, say, appointed by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry from members of that committee, who shall sit with the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, to report the bill back to the Senate, the same plan to be followed with respect to military affairs?

Mr. WARREN. If I understand the Senator correctly, that is what the new rule proposes.

Mr. HARRISON. No; the rule proposes that the Appropriations Committee shall consider the proposition with three members who are to be appointed from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, for instance, if it is an agricultural matter, who are to sit with the Appropriations Committee. What I am suggesting is to allow a subcommittee of three members from the Appropriations Committee to sit with the full Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, for instance, and let the chairman of the Appropriations Committee then make the report to the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I think I get the Senator's idea.

Mr. HARRISON. That would obviate the difficulty.

Mr. WARREN. That still would confuse matters. So far as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is concerned he wishes to say now distinctly—and this applies so far as his committee is concerned, as he understands it—that he is willing to take three men from any one of the appropriating committees, and add one or two or three from the general Appropriations Committee, as many as may be necessary for a subcommittee, and let that subcommittee do exactly as it would under the old committee plan so far as building up a bill is concerned, which then could be presented to the full committee exactly as other bills are.

Following the usual custom those bills are almost invariably accepted, with possibly two or three or four minor changes. For instance, there was a bill only day before yesterday, comprising over 100 pages, and containing a great many items, which had been worked on faithfully by a subcommittee. They called the witnesses and took the testimony and proceeded without interference on the part of the balance of the committee. The whole committee was then called together and, after two hours' consideration, during which time not a penny was added, not a penny was taken off, and no change was made except in one or two places where it was considered better by the subcommittee itself to make changes in language, the bill was ordered reported to the Senate. The fear which the Senator entertains is, in my judgment, without foundation, because it is not, I repeat, that the committee wants the power of controlling except to see that in our bills we do not duplicate what may be contained in other bills.

If the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as the Senator suggests, has a subcommittee looking after some item of appropriation, and another committee is handling a similar appropriation, and it has passed the committee as reported from the Budget, or whether reported from the Budget or not for that matter, and those matters should come up from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the other committee, it would be the duty of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations simply to call it to their attention to avoid duplication. On the other hand, if the Agricultural Appropriation Committee had covered the matter it would be the desire, as well as the duty, of the Appropriations Committee to see that the item was not duplicated in any other bill.

In other words, it is the desire that there shall be one place somewhere where the purposes of the Budget may be carried out, and, on the one hand, not marred by not allowing all that is necessary to run the Government, and, on the other hand, not made ineffective by pyramiding, duplication, and the kind of lapping over that might occur. That is all there is to it.

So far as that is concerned, if the Senator from Mississippi feels that three men are not enough from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry or any other committee, I personally would have no objection to having five instead of three.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not know that it is important at all, but if the rule is adopted or if the rule now is that the chairman, we will say, of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and two members to be selected by the chairman of that committee shall constitute a subcommittee, that gives the chairman the right to select members of his own party. The effect of it would be to deny the minority party any representation at all on the subcommittee which would consider the appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. CARAWAY. He would have that power. That is what the proposed rule says.

Mr. WARREN. The chairman of the committee is allotted the power to appoint his own subcommittees, as a usual thing, and to select whomsoever he chooses. I know of no chairman of any appropriating committee, either now or ever before, who has undertaken a practice of the kind suggested by the Senator. It has always been true that the minority have been allowed what is due them, and they would be allowed it in this case.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will pardon me, the Committee on Ways and Means in the House right now are excluding every Democratic member from the consideration of measures pending before that committee, as I am informed.

Mr. WARREN. They have followed exactly what the Democrats established as a precedent. Then, too, that is not an appropriating committee.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know, but they contemplate appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. CARAWAY. What harm would it do to give to the minority a certainty of representation?

Mr. WARREN. There is a certainty, just as sure as the sun rises and sets, that the chairman is going to select one of his own party and one of the opposition party.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then what is the harm in saying it?

Mr. WARREN. There is no harm, but it is entirely unnecessary. Another thing I wish to assure the Senator is that the three men are expected to be the chairman and a Republican and a Democrat. It would be my duty—and I should follow it invariably unless sickness or something prevented it—in the first place to add another Democrat and another Republican. That would give three Republicans and two Democrats, which is giving the Democrats more than the number they are necessarily entitled to have for representation as their proportion.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will pardon me, and let me do what I do not believe a good Democrat ought ever to do, or ought rarely to do, I will say that I believe absolutely the Senator, as long as he is at the head of the Committee on Appropriations, would be more than just. But in the course of things parties change and the political complexion of the Senate changes. Personally, I do not apprehend the thing could happen that I suggest might happen. I do not think it would, but we are fixing a standing rule of the Senate now.

Mr. WARREN. It could be changed at any time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, we could change it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely wish to inquire whether the Senator is afraid some future Democratic chairman might not appoint any Republicans?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no. I would be very much afraid if the Senator from Wisconsin were at the head of the committee that no Democrat would be apopinted.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. BALL. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if the Committee on the District of Columbia ought not to be included with the other committees? As chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I find that I am very much handicapped in not being in touch or having anyone present at the District Committee meetings who is in touch with the Appropriations Committee, which makes appropriations for the District of Columbia. I think always heretofore the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee has been a member of the Appropriations Committee, but at present he is not.

Mr. WARREN. So far as that is concerned, the District of Columbia has always come to the Committee on Appropriations for appropriations, and it is only by accident that the chairman of the District Committee should have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BALL. That is true.

Mr. WARREN. But I agree with the Senator that the District of Columbia Committee should have great influence with the Appropriations Committee. However, that is out of the power of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, because I am not a member of the Committee on Committees, which appoints the members of the committees, and that is not an appropriating committee.

Mr. BALL. I would like to ask the Senator if he would have any objection to an amendment to the resolution which would include the District of Columbia Committee?

Mr. WARREN. That will lead us into confusion. There is now one of the most virile and powerful Senators in this body who is a member of the Appropriations Committee and a member of the District of Columbia Committee. I refer to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BALL. That is true, but the Senator from Washington is also chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and his duties there of course are very heavy and a great deal of his time is taken up there, although he is very active in the District Committee.

I would like to ask if there is any other appropriations committee—I mean committee that has charge, not of the appropriations, but of the legislation—that is not included in this, such as the District of Columbia Committee?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; there are a number of such committees.

Mr. BALL. Similar to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. WARREN. There are a number of committees which provide for expenditures and which have nothing to do with the appropriations when the Appropriations Committee takes those matters up. The Senator, I think, overlooks the fact, as I think a great many other Senators do, that it is not taking power in any degree from any one of these committees, but really gives them more power, because it ties the hands of the Committee on Appropriations so that it is impossible for them to legislate.

I will call the attention of the Senator to one matter. The Senator has been of great value as chairman of the District Committee and has the backing not only of his own party but of the Senate. A short time ago he passed a bill through the Senate that had been waiting for some time, which, under the rule, made it subject to reference to the Committee on Appropriations. Inside of 36 hours the item was placed in an appropriations bill by the Committee on Appropriations.

We want to divide such matters and have the Appropriations Committee have nothing but the appropriating to do under the law. We want the other committees—the District of Columbia Committee, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and all of them—to continue to legislate and have charge of matters of legislation. For instance, take the Committee on the Judiciary, where they have control of all the judges and all the courts of the country and everything of that kind. Every dollar of that is handled by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BALL. I should not think the Judiciary Committee and the appropriations through which they provide for the judiciary would be a proper comparison with the District of Columbia Committee, which really has the affairs of the District of Columbia under its control. The appropriations for the District of Columbia vary, running into every phase of municipal government, while the appropriations granted by the Judiciary Committee are principally for salaries.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say further to the Senator that there is no loss of power to his committee. In addition to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], he also has the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who, as chairman of the subcommittee, was in charge of that matter and would be hereafter.

Mr. BALL. I am not fighting for power; but all these appropriations for the District of Columbia are sent to me, and I necessarily have to hunt up the Appropriations Committee, as the situation now is. However, if I am always to know just what these conditions are when these matters were coming up, I should have some intimate touch with the workings of the Appropriations Committee itself.

Mr. WARREN. No; not with the Appropriations Committee, because the commissioners have to come through the Budget system and have their estimates come down to us that way. All of that has to come from the Budget Bureau. I think the Senator will understand that his advice there is, of course, always taken, or should be.

Mr. BALL. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations realizes that the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee is in a measure held responsible for all legislation and appropriations affecting the District. He receives the censure, at least, for failure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I hope he will give careful consideration to the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware. When the matter was called to my attention it struck me very favorably. It seemed to me that the District of Columbia Committee is very much on a plane with the other appropriating committees, except that for some reason—I do not know what—the District of Columbia Committee has not heretofore been making appropriations for the District of Columbia. For instance, the Committee on Indian Affairs has been appropriating for Indian matters, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has been appropriating for agricultural matters, the Committee on Military Affairs for military matters, and so on, but the District of Columbia Committee has not been appropriating for District of Columbia matters. It does seem to me that on account of the intimate relationship——

Mr. WARREN. I am inclined to think there are more than two members of the District Committee who are also members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be true, but that only happens so.

The other members of the District of Columbia Committee who are on the Appropriations Committee only happen to be there. We are going to provide by this proposed rule not that those members of the Agricultural Committee, for instance, who happen also to be on the Appropriations Committee shall stay there, but we are going to provide absolutely that there must be three members of the various appropriating committees on the Appropriations Committee. It might well happen in the future that the two members of the District Committee who are now also on the Appropriations Committee would cease to be members of the District Committee, and, therefore, then, there might be no representation of the Committee on the District of Columbia on the Appropriations Committee. I merely wanted to appeal to the Senator very carefully to consider the suggestion, because it does seem to me that it would be a mighty good thing when the District of Columbia appropriation bill is being considered to have the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia and two other members of that committee on the Appropriations Committee, just the same as it is proposed to provide representation for the other committees. I believe that if the Senator from Wyoming will reflect upon the suggestion it will appeal to his judgment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not have to pinch myself because I have already given considerable thought to the suggestion. However, if the matter might stop there, it would be one thing, but just where would the Senator from Washington have it stop? Other committees have just as much right to ask for representation on the Committee on Appropriations as has the Committee on the District of Columbia, and really they have more right because other appropriation bills have been taken entirely away from other committees which have heretofore handled them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that every committee which deals with a particular subject in connection with which an appropriation bill is considered is by this proposed rule to be given representation upon the Committee on Appropriations except the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARREN. No; the Senator from Washington is mistaken about that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have the Senator from Wyoming name a committee which is interested in an appropriation bill, as is the District of Columbia Committee, to which it is not proposed to give representation on the Committee on appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. There are several such committees—for instance, the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Pensions, and some others.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The case of the Committee on Pensions, of course, is entirely different, and so far as the Committee on Fortifications is concerned, I did not know that we had a Committee on Fortifications; I do not think we have.

Mr. WARREN. We have had until a very recent day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not for two or three years. When we abolished the smaller committees we abolished that committee, because it had never acted and never had anything to do.

Mr. WARREN. I know the Senator from Washington desires to be correct. That committee has until recent times been in existence.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was a committee of the Senate until we abolished the minor committees.

Mr. WARREN. No; that committee was not abolished as being a minor committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I beg the Senator's pardon. I think the Senator is mistaken. I think he will find that it is true that the Fortifications Committee was abolished by the resolution of the late Senator Knox, of Pennsylvania, when we reduced the number of committees; but previous to that time, of course, everyone recognized that the Fortifications Committee was purely a minor committee and simply for the purpose of furnishing a chairmanship.

Mr. HARRISON. And it never did report bills carrying appropriations?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no; it never did that. However, the case of the District Committee appeals so strongly to me, and it seems so clear to me that that committee bears exactly the same relation to the District of Columbia appropriation bill as the Committee on Agriculture bears to the Agricultural appropriation bill, that I thought the proposition of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] should receive favorable consideration.

Mr. WARREN. The difference is that the Committee on Agriculture does not happen now to have any member on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that, but the adoption of the proposed rule insures that the Committee on Agriculture will have representation on the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WARREN. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is another instance. I have served on that committee for some twenty-odd years, and that committee has never had a place on the Committee on Appropriations except as some Senator might be a member of both committees. That committee reports bills involving the expenditure of great sums of money, just as does the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the Appropriations Committee provides the appropriations.

I have no prejudice against the Committee on the District of Columbia; on the contrary, I am for the most liberal treatment always to the District and to the committee that represents it; but this being a proposed change of the rules, I should feel as if the Committee on Rules, which has this entire matter in charge, would hardly feel that I had confined myself to the intent of the resolution should I now yield to these various suggestions of Senators.

I have no personal objection, of course, to the proposed increased representation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to say that, of course, no question may be made in regard to the friendliness of the Senator from Wyoming to the District of Columbia. I can testify to that from my experience with him on the Appropriations Committee.

TITLES ON TABLETS AND OTHER MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate House concurrent resolution No. 49, which was read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 5013) entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the use of certain titles on tablets and other memorials," the Clerk be authorized and directed to enroll the title so as to read as follows:

"An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the inscription of titles upon certain monuments, tablets, or other memorials."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the correction proposed in the resolution has been made necessary by reason of an oversight on the part of the Senate in failing to amend the title of the bill therein referred to in order to conform to the amendment which was adopted in the Senate. I move that the Senate agree to the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2492) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1921, which was, on page 1, line 13, to strike out "a price" and to insert "average current prices."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, in my humble judgment, does not change the meaning or intent of the bill in the slightest degree. It simply substitutes for the words "a price," as used in the Senate print, the term "average current prices." I can see no essential difference between the two phrases, and for one I am perfectly willing to concur in the House amendment. I have not had an opportunity to discuss this matter with other members of the Military Affairs Committee, but the fact is as I have just stated it. I therefore move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution were each read twice by title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

H. R. 8475. An act to relieve enlisted men affected thereby from certain hardship incident to the operation of the proviso of section 4b of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, and to protect disbursing officers in connection therewith; and

H. J. Res. 263. Joint resolution authorizing the purchase of land for cemeteries for American military dead in Europe and the improvement thereof.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, to amend the standing rules of the Senate, so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I had intended opening my remarks this afternoon with observations of a general character; but just as the joint resolution which just came over from the House was being referred to the Military Affairs Committee it occurred to me that it furnished an excellent example of the confusion of our appropriating system. The House joint resolution referred to provides appropriations for the purchase of land in France for the extension and improvement of the cemeteries in which our soldier dead are buried. It so happened that I was on my feet at the time it was handed down, and the Vice President—if I may violate a confidence to this extent—nodded toward me, and I said, sotto voce, that the bill might well be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; yet, Mr. President, as a rule, except in times of emergency, all bills dealing with the purchase of real estate for the Army have gone to the Committee on Appropriations, although at times they have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs. No one knows exactly why that changing course is adopted.

In the discussion which has thus far taken place I have heard some contention to the effect that the theory followed by the Senate in referring appropriation bills was consistent. I regard it as far from consistent. I am not acquainted, of course, with the legislative history of appropriation bills which have gone to other committees of the Senate, but I am somewhat familiar with the legislative history and customs relating to the bills which have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and to certain other bills not referred to the Committee on Military Affairs which none the less affect the Military Establishment. My opportunities to observe this situation have been such as to convince me that there is no consistency in practice at all, and I think we need not disturb ourselves as to the proposal suggested by the Committee on Rules on the ground that there is any inconsistency about it, for, as a matter of fact, it is far more consistent than our present system.

Mr. President, I wish to cite a few examples. For many years back the Army appropriation bill, as every Senator knows, has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That bill carries all the appropriations for the pay and allowances of the officers and men of the Army, for their clothing, their subsistence, and for a considerable proportion of their supplies other than clothing and subsistence. Among those supplies, for example, are rifles and machine guns. The appropriations for those articles go to the Committee on Military Affairs, while the appropriations for Field Artillery guns and the ammunition for Field Artillery guns do not now go, and never have gone, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN. And the same thing is true as to the guns for the Coast Artillery.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; appropriations for such ordnance have gone to the Committee on Appropriations under the heading of the fortification bill. So we have one committee, the Committee on Military Affairs, providing for the purchase of rifles and small arms ammunition for the troops, and another committee providing for the purchase of field artillery and its ammunition for the same troops, and neither committee knows what the other committee is doing. Some of us on the Military Affairs Committee have endeavored to ascertain what were the prospects for Field Artillery equipment at the hands of the Appropriations Committee, but at the time we would make our inquiry the bill might not have reached the Appropriations Committee at all and we would have to go ahead without that information.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has just disclosed a very interesting situation, namely, that for the same troops some of their arms are appropriated for by one committee and some by another committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator—and I presume he intends to cover the point directly—if it is not true that the amount of artillery, for instance, or of small arms, might depend to quite an extent upon the other weapons for which appropriations are provided by another committee? Is not that true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President, because there may be a change in the type of arms, necessitating a complete reequipment of some branch of the service with offensive weapons.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me see if I understand the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Some weapon may become obsolete, and the committee which has charge of the appropriations for purchasing that weapon might agree with the experts who come before it and assent to the proposition that an additional or special appropriation be made to reequip that branch of the service with a newer weapon, and while we are doing that we ought to know what some other committee is spending for those same troops for another offensive weapon, but we never do know.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the question I am asking the Senator. I do not believe he quite understood me, or, perhaps, I did not make my question plain. Does the amount that the Military Affairs Committee may now appropriate for troops depend in any degree upon the amount which may be appropriated by the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not to-day, but I think it should. That is the trouble.

Mr. NORRIS. If it should, of course, it all ought to be done by one committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly; so that we will know how much our Army is costing us.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it is because it is done by two different committees that the proper efficiency is not maintained, or the proper relationship between the arms and munitions is not maintained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true. That is the difficulty, and that is the difficulty—if I may use the expression—that I am inveighing against.

Mr. NORRIS. I am agreeing with the Senator entirely.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not halt there, however. Up to this year there has been a sundry civil appropriation bill. The military authorities desire a new barrack built to house the troops which are paid for under appropriations made, we will say, by the Military Affairs Committee; but the appropriation for that barrack does not come to the Military Affairs Committee. It is contained in a flotsam and jetsam of items in the old sundry civil bill and goes to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Or it did go there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does now, under our present custom, which has not yet been changed.

Mr. WARREN. In the bill which will come in it will not be that way.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But we are speaking now of the situation as of to-day, assuming that we are not going to change anything.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the military authorities regard it as necessary, and persuade a sufficient number of Senators or appropriate committees, that a fortification be erected at the harbor of Portland, in the State of Maine, two or three elements instantly are involved. One of them is the men to man the fortification. That matter, of course, affecting the strength of the Army and the pay of enlisted men and officers, goes to the Military Affairs Committee. The purchase of the guns to equip the fortification is carried in the fortifications bill and goes to the Appropriations Committee. The appropriation for the purchase of the land is carried in the sundry civil bill and goes to the Appropriations Committee. The ammunition for the guns is carried in the fortifications bill and goes to the Appropriations Committee. Neither committee knows what the other is doing; at least, it is exceedingly difficult for us to get together and have any teamwork. More than that, all the civil-service employees of the War Department, with the exception of one class which I shall mention, are provided for as to salaries, or were provided for as to salaries, in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill—men employed solely in connection with the Army, with nothing else on earth to do except work for the Army. The Military Affairs Committee knew nothing about it. There is, however, one class who are nevertheless civil-service employees, doing clerical work, who are carried in the Army appropriation bill, and those are the clerks in the office of the Chief of Staff and in the headquarters of corps areas—appropriations amounting to many thousands of dollars. There is one great class of employees, all under the civil service, all doing clerical work, all of them working for the Army exclusively, and they are cared for in two separate bills. So let me suggest that to-day, so far as the military activities of the Government are concerned, there is no consistency whatsoever. It is split up and confused.

I have mentioned this in part on prior occasions before the Senate and have uttered it as my purely personal opinion that all the appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment should go either to the Military Affairs Committee or to the Committee on Appropriations. I think the correctness of that theory, at least, can not be successfully denied. I have often talked about it with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. Members of the Military Affairs Committee other than myself have talked with him about it. We have been somewhat fortunate, and I will say rather more than fortunate, in the fact that the Senator from Wyoming happens to be a member of the Military Affairs Committee; but his duties as chairman of the Appropriations Committee are so onerous that it is exceedingly difficult for him to sit in hour after hour with the Military Affairs Committee and keep us informed of what his committee is doing on closely related topics. We do find—and I think the Senator from Wyoming will bear me out in this—that when some influence brought to bear upon his committee in behalf of an appropriation for some especial project fails to persuade his committee, that same influence is quite often attempted on the Military Affairs Committee, and quite often we do not know that the Appropriations Committee has denied it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, not only is that so, but at times when we add some restriction to an appropriation, they will go to the Committee on Military Affairs and by some legislation wipe out that restriction, or the other way. If a restriction is made to protect the appropriations of the Military Affairs Committee they come to us; and so we have to keep a closer watch, and it is the duty of the Appropriations Committee to do that. Sometimes, however, the item comes in by some member of the Committee on Appropriations, and goes through so quickly that it can not be helped. I think the Senator from New York will remember that as to automobiles we once or twice had some legislation, and it was immediately wiped out through some other committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. President, the present situation is exceedingly difficult. I speak only for myself, sir. I do not rejoice in this change as freely as I would if it could be done in a somewhat different form. This whole question of the budget is new in America. It never has been installed on a large scale, nor has it as yet been attempted to apply the theory of a budget upon a Government in this country whose ramifications and complications approach in extent and in degree the ramifications and the complications of the Federal Government. The truth of the matter is that the Federal Government has become so complicated under our hodge-podge way of carrying it on, its ramifications have reached such an extent, and its undertakings have become so huge that I venture to say, with all respect to my colleagues in the Senate and to other public officers, that there is not a man alive to-day, from the President down, who understands and comprehends the Government of the United States. It is beyond the ken of individuals, or of any individual, as at present organized.

Now we are in the midst of a tremendous effort, and a well-intended effort, to improve its organization, to group its activities in such a way that the public at large can see them displayed in the broad light of day, and to bring about a condition of affairs, if such a thing is humanly possible, where the average citizen will know something about what his Government is doing with his money.

I regard the budget theory as a most important step in that direction. It is not going to be perfect in its operation, Mr. President, perhaps not as nearly perfect as some of its most optimistic supporters have expected. Its success will be limited from time to time by the ability and the motives of those who operate it. Even if we concede, however, that human nature and human beings never can reach absolute perfection, I think we must admit that if we erect a piece of machinery capable of being operated by human beings of average intelligence, which does so arrange things that not only all the membership of the Congress but the average taxpayer can understand what is going on, we at least have taken a step which will make it possible for the complications and the ramifications of our Government to be simplified. So, Mr. President, I have viewed with high hopes—not with absolute confidence of its perfection, but with high hopes—the installation of a budget system.

Mr. President, I hesitate to inflict upon the Senate a hobby, or any pet idea that I may have; but I venture to ask your indulgence for just a moment in a brief discussion of the legislative side of this budget work.

Speaking with entire respect for the great legislative body that sits at the other end of the Capitol, I experienced some degree of disappointment in the manner in which they went about applying the budget system to their legislative procedure. I had entertained the impression—which I can not boast was based upon exhaustive study, but which perhaps was instinctive—that a practical way toward applying a budget system to a legislative body in the matter of appropriations would be the establishment of a central committee—call it the budget committee, if you please—which should decide how much money in the aggregate might be spent in a fiscal year, and, having decided how much money in the aggregate might be spent, that committee should thereupon apportion fixed maximum amounts to the standing committees still existing having in charge the appropriation bills for the several branches of the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator right there that that could not very well have been done this year for the appropriation bills, because of the lack of revenue legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course not.

Mr. WARREN. There is a quite large line between what we may collect and what we may not collect, but I understand that it is right in line with the principle and idea of a budget that there is to come in some form from the Budget, either through a committee or through the President, a statement of the whole amount of money that is expected, and some indication of the recommendation as to how it may be divided. That is a part of the plan, and we shall have to wait for it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Before I yield to the Senator from Washington, let me say that I did not mean to give the impression that I was complaining of or criticizing the action of the House in erecting the machinery which they did erect.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; I understand that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I imagine that under the peculiar circumstances, faced as they were with a situation very difficult to calculate as to income and outgo, the system they did erect was the one which could most promptly meet the exigency. I was merely expressing my disappointment, and discussing it in a somewhat academic sense, in that the situation was such that a truly budget system as applicable to a legislative body was not, in my judgment, actually established.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I may have misunderstood the Senator from Wyoming in his colloquy with the Senator from New York; but, as I understood him, his suggestion of a budget organization was one that would come from the President, from the executive branch of the Government.

That, of course, involves the fundamental principle of this whole controversy. It is entirely different from the suggestion which has just been made by the Senator from New York, as I understood him; and I may say that some time ago, as much as a year ago, I offered a resolution for a rule somewhat along the lines suggested by the Senator from New York providing for a budget committee.

I understand the Senator from New York to suggest a budget committee in the legislative branch of the Government, not in the executive branch. What has the executive branch of the Government to do with appropriations, with appropriating money?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will read the Budget law, he will find that it provides definitely that the President must convey to us the finding of the Budget Bureau.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not talking about the Budget law. It is the so-called Budget law; but we are talking about a proposed new Budget arrangement, not included in the present law at all, and the Senator from Wyoming seems to go back again to the old idea, which was the limit and the extent of the so-called Budget law, that Congress has to depend upon the various bureaus and executive officials of the Government to direct and inform it about the Budget of the Nation, which really means the amount of money that is to be raised from the people by taxation, on the one hand, and the amount that is to be expended and the purposes for which it is to be expended, upon the other hand.

It is a fundamental displacement of the constitutional departments of the Government to embody any such idea in the question of the Budget, which has been discussed and which is being discussed now. Congress is the place where the Budget should be made up. This is the place, consequently, where the Budget organization ought to be, and I agree entirely with the Senator from New York in his suggestion of a separate Budget committee. But that will not be accomplished, and that need will not be fulfilled, by any sort of an official or committee of the executive branch of the Government. It will have to be in Congress.

Mr. WARREN. In reply to that, this is probably not the time to treat that matter as the Senator suggests, but the various committees now go as far as they can to give us the benefit of their study and their idea as to what we ought to expend for the various purposes. The Bureau of the Budget figures the necessities, and the House committee, so far as it is concerned, has very seldom gone above those estimates, but has gone below to a very large extent; that is, they have brought out bills carrying far less than the Budget would authorize and far less than the Government can be run upon, and there is a necessity, therefore, of deficiency appropriations; but the power is still in the Senate and House, of course, to accept or reject the Budget figures. It is their business to get all the information possible and then refer to us what they believe to be the proper estimates, whereas under the old system the estimates came hit or miss, as each chief clerk of a division made them up. They came without any pruning and were hastily prepared, with the consequence that we did not have the information we have had later.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator certainly would not suggest that the so-called Budget organization would have the power, for instance, to determine how much money should be expended on the Military Establishment of the country and how much should be expended upon agriculture. The determination of those questions, and, coupled with it, which is just as important or more important, in fact, the determination of how that amount of money shall be raised, and the putting of those things in the statement is the making of a budget and it can not be accomplished in the executive departments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the colloquy which has just taken place diverts me for just a moment from the course of my discussion. As I look upon it, the Government of the United States might be regarded, for the purpose of discussion, somewhat in the light of a great business corporation. In the business world the president of a corporation and the vice presidents and general managers are the executives, of course, and they propose lines of policy to the body of the corporation, involving, we will say, expenditures, new investments, new undertakings, or the diminution of old undertakings. Those suggestions, with all the weight to which they are entitled, are submitted to the board of directors, who, representing the stockholders, pass upon them.

The President of the United States, and let us say, for the purpose of this discussion, the members of the Cabinet, are the executive officers of the Government. The Congress in a very true sense, I think, occupies the position of a board of directors representing the stockholders, who are the people of the United States, and it is entirely proper and entirely wise that the law should provide in mandatory fashion, if necessary, as I believe it does to-day, that the Executive, with the assistance of his subordinates, shall submit to the board of directors, the Congress, his recommendations concerning expenditures, together with estimates of income, and itemize them as far and to as great detail as seems necessary for the advice of the Congress.

As I understand it, that is the theory upon which we have embarked. The difficulty has been that the Congress was not in a position, at the time the law was passed, to erect promptly in both Houses, simultaneously, the legislative machinery for the consideration of the Budget. The House, as I understand it, found itself called upon at a moment's notice, as it were, to devise the machinery. The Senate has waited a year, in effect, without moving, and, as I was saying a short time ago, I had hoped, and I believe through a process of evolution something like this may come some day, that we should have in each House what might be truly called a budget committee, which, after examining the recommendations sent in by the Executive, should make up its mind how much money the Government of the United States should spend for the ensuing fiscal year, fix the aggregate, and again, after examining the recommendations of the Executive, make up its mind how much might be spent as a maximum for the Naval Establishment, for the Department of Agriculture, for the Military Establishment, and so on down through the list of the important Government activities, and apportion those amounts in mandatory fashion among the existing standing committees, and say to the Committee on Naval Affairs, "You can have $250,000,000. That is all you can have, unless by a suspension of the rules of the House or the rules of the Senate, as the case may be, that amount is raised. But in the preparing of your bill you must stay within that sum. You make the bill. Fix the details as you please, because the details of an appropriation bill are inseparable from policy." So on through the different standing committees.

Mr. KING. May I suggest to the Senator that you would have to supplement that policy, which I concede to be a wise one, by repealing some of the existing laws which permit various executive departments to spend without an appropriation in anticipation of getting a deficiency bill passed. They go ahead and spend, and we are confronted with deficiency bills.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, those are details which do not affect the principle I am discussing.

It is perfectly apparent that that could not be done, and I hold no pride of opinion to the effect that that would be the best solution. That was merely a thought which has been running through my mind for some years back as to the legislative practice which might be invoked.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The plan the Senator suggests I understand has been considered, and the objection has been raised that under such a plan the Budget Committee could not know, and would not know in the first instance, concerning the relative needs or the proper distribution of the total amount to be expended; but to meet that objection the suggestion has been made that with that same Budget Committee, the Appropriations Committees, as they now exist, might make their appropriation bills; but, instead of going to the House or the Senate, they must first go to the Budget Committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For revision?

Mr. LENROOT. For revision; and if the aggregate were in excess of the receipts, then, with the information which the Budget Committee might have, they might say to this committee: "You must pare down your bill so much, or that item so much."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Undoubtedly, refinements and improvements of any such suggestion as that are more than possible; in fact, they are highly probable.

Mr. President, I have indulged in this somewhat academic discussion, and do not care to carry it on much longer. No matter what any of us think concerning the best way to approach this problem in the legislative branch of the Government, we are to-day confronted with a situation which, in my humble judgment, we can not dodge. We are driven to a conclusion, if I may use that somewhat emphatic expression. The House has acted, and acted in no uncertain fashion. They have made one committee to handle all appropriations, limiting its power only with respect to the recommendation of legislative proposals.

They have not even given the standing committees of the House ex officio or any other kind of representation upon their Committee on Appropriations. They have centered the power in 36 men out of a total membership of 435. A few minor adjustments were made in the committee assignments of that great legislative body in order to bring about an enlargement of their Appropriations Committee; nevertheless, no member of the Committee on Agriculture of the House, no member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, no member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, as such, has anything to do with the making up of the agricultural appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, or the Army appropriation bill, and the same observation would hold good as to all their appropriating machinery to-day.

They have completely revamped and regrouped the bills themselves. They have changed their character in several instances completely. It is inevitable that great appropriation measures shall be initiated in the House. It has always been done, it always will be done, and it always should be done. We can not avoid the difficulty which is created by the revamping of those bills. There is no longer to be a sundry civil bill. The items formerly carried in that are to be scattered and regrouped in other bills. No longer is there to be a legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The items formerly carried in that are to be regrouped, scattered, and rearranged in other bills, with a new nomenclature from top to bottom. There is to be no rivers and harbors bill. The rivers and harbors items are to be included in the War Department appropriation bills. There is to be no Army appropriation bill. The funds for the support of the Military Establishment, such as I recited a little while ago, are to be in the War Department bill. There is to be no separate item in any other bill for the support of the administration of the Panama Canal; that is to be in the War Department bill. The salaries of the civil-service clerks in the War Department—and there are hundreds and hundreds of them, and they used to be taken care of in the legislative bill—are to be taken care of in the War Department bill. All the items in the fortifications bill, as we formerly knew it, is to be in the War Department bill.

The War Department bill as at present contemplated, if I read the prospectus aright, is to be the largest bill sent over here. It is to include anything and everything over which the War Department has direct or indirect jurisdiction. What is going to happen to that? We can not split it up. We can not take out the river and harbor items and send them to the Committee on Commerce. We can not take out the civil-service employee items and send them to the Committee on Appropriations and leave the pay of enlisted men and officers and other things in the Army appropriation bill as they originally appeared in the Army appropriation bill, and send them to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ever hope to get those separated elements back together again under the same original title as passed by the House. It is easy to tear these bills to pieces and distribute them to three or four committees, but we will never get them back together again.

We can not discard the identity of the original House measure. If we destroy its identity our legislative machinery halts, stops absolutely, and we will have an impossible deadlock, with no one able to do anything.

I hope we can approach the proposition entirely free from the effect upon the prerogatives or powers, so called, of individual Senators. Certainly if I were to approach it in a purely personal attitude, I could not be enthusiastic over a proposal which would seemingly deprive the Committee on Military Affairs of what some people are pleased to call power. As a matter of fact, I do not believe these proposals, in the long run, are going to deprive any committee of real power, especially when we consider that the proposed rule forbids specifically the Committee on Appropriations from proposing legislation upon appropriation bills.

So long as the standing committees retain solely for themselves the right to legislate, which carries with it the sole right to authorize appropriations in the future, the power of these committees is going to remain to all intents and purposes intact. The House has already demonstrated that in many instances. The Appropriations Committee of the House can not undertake a new appropriation unauthorized by statute. The House Committee on Appropriations must wait for the appropriate standing committee to report and for the House to pass and for the Senate to pass the amendment to the statute authorizing the Appropriations Committee, in effect, to go ahead and make the appropriate appropriations.

That system will be installed in the Senate. The proposed rule contemplates that very thing. We shall have to meet the situation within a few weeks; indeed, it should be met within a few days. We can not let things drift. We have to get in step with the procession, even though we think the procession in some minor degree does not travel the straightest road toward legislative efficiency. We can no longer travel the old road. We are completely diverted and driven from it.

For one, and speaking for myself alone, I am willing that a rule such as this should be adopted. I would not say it is perfect. The suggestion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] is perhaps worthy of consideration, as it relates to the Committee on the District of Columbia. For one, and speaking for myself alone, I am willing to lend what effort I can exert toward the establishment of the theory that we shall make this Government of ours more efficient if we will simplify its processes. After all, though Senators may say that proposals of this kind group too much power in the hands of too few men, nothing can ever deprive the majority of the Senators from doing anything they want with any bill that is reported to the Senate by any committee.

To contend insistently that this proposal, which gives representation upon the Appropriations Committee to each of the standing committees that has ever had anything to do with appropriations is to rob sixty-odd Senators of power is in my judgment a reflection upon the intelligence and the ability of those sixty-odd Senators, who will be sitting here on the floor of the Senate anxious to promote the legitimate interests of their States and constituencies and ever able, by a majority vote in the Senate, to upset and overturn completely anything that the Committee on Appropriations does or fails to do.

I think the rule as proposed by the Committee on Rules is better than the House procedure, because it does give the opportunity for the Appropriations Committee to discuss with some of the members of the standing committee the peculiar problems which affect the appropriations which those standing committees have been accustomed for years to handle. Many of these Government services are built up upon a great body of statutes which have grown from year to year, from session to session of the Congress, slowly in some instances, rapidly in others. The standing committees have reported the bills which have resulted in the enactment of those statutes.

Standing committees know the reason for those changes. They know the history of the legislation. In my humble judgment it is essential that whatever agency we employ in reporting appropriations to the Senate, that agency shall have the advice and assistance of those other Senators who have taken part, in a greater or less degree, in the framing of legislation upon which, in the last analysis, the appropriations are based.

The proposed rule is infinitely more liberal in its provisions than the House rule. This rule gives certain recognition to the standing committees and the knowledge which those committees necessarily possess as the result of their long study and experience. The Committee on Appropriations under this rule can embark upon no new undertaking involving an appropriation until there is legislative authority for so doing, and that legislative authority must come from some one or other of the standing committees.

So, Mr. President, while I, and perhaps several others, do not believe that this is the most perfect solution of this most difficult problem, I do believe that we are compelled by force of circumstances and by the dictates of common sense to meet the situation and to clarify it in a legislative sense to the very best of our ability.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have listened to this discussion with a good deal of interest. It has illustrated the great confusion which exists among Senators in respect to the Budget system. By adopting the Budget system, as we call it, or attempting to adopt it, we adopted a foreign importation. The Budget system has only its true home and effectiveness in what we call a parliamentary system of government like that of Great Britain. There the executive department is in the hands of the ministry and the members of the ministry are members of the House of Commons and some of them members of the House of Lords.

The budget, so called, is prepared by those ministers and presented to the Parliament. It is presented to the House of Commons as the act of the collective ministry. They prepare the entire budget of appropriations. It is the plan of the Government, and when they present it to the Parliament through the House of Commons, they have that plan adopted, because they are members of the legislative branch which enacts the legislation. If they fail in carrying out their budget system, if the budget is defeated, they resign and a new government is formed.

We have attempted in this country to import the Budget system, which comes from the parliamentary system of government in England, where practically the executive department is blended in the legislative department. Here our executive department, the President of the United States, is separate and distinct from the legislative department; he has no direct voice in either House of Congress, while in the parliamentary system of Great Britain and other parliamentary countries the ministry, who are on the one hand the executive department, also control the legislative department.

We have attempted to adopt that system. We have conferred the power on the executive department to prepare, as it were, the Budget, but our executive department, unlike the executive department under the parliamentary system of Great Britain, can not come into Congress and say, "This is our Budget and we want it passed as we have formed it; we want it adopted just as we have planned it and made it." All that the executive department can do under our system of government is simply to recommend to Congress. They recommend such and such a Budget and such and such a plan.

Mr. President, we have seen fit to adopt what we call the Budget system, but we find it will not fit here exactly as it fits in a parliamentary government. There is a great reluctance in the Senate, a great reluctance on the part of those committees who have heretofore had charge of appropriation bills, to follow the plan completely. If we want to carry out the Budget system as far as is possible under our system of government we must have all appropriation bills referred to one committee, otherwise our Budget system will be a failure from end to end.

If we carry out the plan as suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] it will be utterly destructive of any real Budget system.

When we attempted this legislation I said in a mild way, but, of course, no one paid any attention because it was to be a great reform, that it would be found that it would not work here as it does in a parliamentary government, where it had its origin. I said I was somewhat doubtful about it. In the discussion to-day and yesterday we have had a manifestation of what we might call in military parlance "die hard." Those committees which have heretofore had charge of appropriation bills "die hard." They dislike to give up their powers, and they do not appreciate the purposes and objects attempted to be accomplished by the Budget system.

Unless we want to take a backward step, unless we want to defeat the budget plan which we have adopted—and it is not a well-fitting plan under our system of government—unless we want entirely to defeat it, we must go ahead and follow the scheme outlined by the Senator from New York. There is only one way in which it is possible under our system of government, and that is to do as they have done in the House of Representatives—refer all appropriation bills to one committee. That is what we ought to do in the Senate. If we fail to do it we disintegrate to that extent the so-called budget system which we have adopted. Our only salvation, if we want to maintain that system, is to leave it in the hands of the Appropriations Committee.

For the purpose of making it easy for the other committees which have heretofore had charge of appropriation bills, the Committee on Rules, of which I am a member, concluded—and I agreed to it through the kindness of my heart and through sympathy—that when certain appropriation bills come before the Committee on Appropriations they should invite the chairman and two other members of the respective committees which had heretofore had the appropriation bills to joint with the Appropriations Committee in the consideration of those bills.

To illustrate: The Army appropriation bill which is coming in will contain appropriations for the Military Establishment. That heretofore has gone to the Committee on Military Affairs. It will contain appropriations for rivers and harbors. To carry out the plan of the amendment which we have reported, there must be three members from the Committee on Commerce—the chairman and two others—and there must be three members from the Military Affairs Committee—the chairman and two others—when the Army appropriation bill is being considered. In other words, it is proposed that the Committee on Appropriations shall have the benefit of six additional members.

This, Mr. President, seems to me to be a brake on the budget system. We agreed to it for the purpose of making it easy for the other committees which have heretofore considered appropriation bills to adopt the new plan. I hope the new system will succeed, so far as it is possible to do so under our plan of government.

The only other conceivable way in which the plan could be worked out, and by which we could more nearly approximate the British system, the parliamentary system, would be for both Houses of Congress to unite in creating a great budget committee, and leaving that budget committee, instead of the President and the executive departments, to present what might be called the budget to the two Houses of Congress. I apprehend, however, that that would not work under our peculiar system of government, where the executive department is distinct from the legislative department, our Government not being a parliamentary government. In adopting a budget system we have probably gone as far as we possibly can in providing that the executive department shall furnish us estimates as to what amount should be appropriated. In order to make the system complete, however, I do not see any other way except to follow the system which has been adopted in the House of Representatives. By adopting the amendment which the Committee on Rules has reported, as I have stated, we make the transition easier for the old appropriating committees. By and by, after we become hardened we may leave the Appropriations Committee to act entirely by itself without giving it these temporary assistants. I hope that day may come. I am in favor of a budget system, so far as we can make it work, but I have never conceded, and I do not now concede, that we can ever make it work so successfully as it can work under a parliamentary system of government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, personally I have no desire to oppose the rule which is proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. In so far as its effect upon some of the existing appropriating committees is concerned, with the provision for the selection of certain members of those committees to sit with the Appropriations Committee, I think it rather enhances than detracts from the power of those members. However, I want to ask some questions of the Senator from Wyoming concerning the form of this proposed rule. As I understand from reading it, so far as it fixes the parliamentary law governing the consideration of appropriation bills much more may be done by way of amendment to appropriation bills than the committee may originally do in framing it; that is, under the proposed rule as it is framed, a great many things may be placed in an appropriation bill from the floor which the committee itself may not place in it in framing and reporting the bill to the Senate. I fail to see the reason for that, though there may be some good reason for it. Consequently I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming in reference to the matter.

Mr. WARREN. What is there in the rule which gives the Senator from Washington the impression which he has stated?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will read the language to the Senate and call attention to its effect. The first part of the proposed rule provides:

1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate submitted in accordance with law.

That is almost substantially and exactly the existing rule.

Mr. WARREN. It is precisely the existing rule, but——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me complete my question and point out the ground upon which I base my observation. Under this part of the proposed rule, which is the same as the existing rule, an amendment to a general appropriation bill will be in order, even though it adds a new item of appropriation increasing the amount, or even though it is not for the purpose of carrying out some provision of existing law, if it has been "moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate submitted in accordance with law."

Mr. LODGE. That is the present rule.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Washington read the language which follows what he has just read?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is my purpose to do that, if the Senator will give me the opportunity. The language following what I have just read reads:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation—

That is sufficient—and I think there is no qualification to that—

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or original legislation.

The Committee on Appropriations is circumscribed by that unconditional provision, although when they have, in accordance with the rule, reported an appropriation bill without any new or general legislation—and that would be construed to apply to any proposed appropriation for some purpose not authorized by existing law—then any Senator on the floor of the Senate would have the authority to rise and offer an amendment providing for such an appropriation, if it had been recommended by a standing or select committee.

Mr. WARREN. A Senator has that privilege now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; a Senator has that privilege now; but the committee also has that privilege; the committee is not circumscribed as it would be by the latter part of the proposed new rule which I have read.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is not objecting to making the restriction stronger, is he?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am asking the Senator why it is proposed to give greater latitude to amendments to a bill on the floor of the Senate than is allowed to the committee in framing the bill?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, that portion of the proposed rule which the Senator has read is no more sweeping than the general rule which we have adopted and which now exists against general legslation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, there is this difference: If a point of order shall be made against some provision that is reported, if this proposed rule shall be adopted, and the point of order is sustained, the bill must be recommitted immediately; it goes back to the committee.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is a new provision.

Mr. HARRISON. The point of order, if sustained, would shoot it back, whereas under the present rule the bill would not go back to the committee, but the point of order would only affect that portion of the bill against which the point of order was raised.

Mr. LODGE. That is quite true, but a point of order can be made against general legislation under the existing rule, which, as the Senator from Mississippi points out, only has the effect of throwing out the particular item. Under the proposed new rule, however, such a point of order, if sustained, will carry the whole bill back to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this rule, if the Senator will permit me, if adopted, would really have the effect of keeping legislation off appropriation bills, so far as the committee is concerned——

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. NORRIS. Because the penalty will be so severe as to dissuade the committee from taking such action. Under the existing rule the penalty is nothing but a rejection of the particular item, and that does not injure the bill in general, but if the proposed rule were adopted the Committee on Appropriations, as I look at it, would be shorn of the only power which they have which involves any danger.

Mr. WARREN. The only thing that could be done in that case would be for some member of the committee or some Member of the Senate to ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it would require unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. An item of the kind the Senators have in mind could not come before the Senate in a bill as reported from the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, could not the committee directly authorize some one of its members to offer an amendment, giving one day's notice under the rule of a motion to suspend the rules; in that way put the provision in the bill; and then the rule would not operate to send the bill back to the committee?

Mr. NORRIS. That would have to be done in the Senate; the committee could not do that. Why should not the Senate, when it has the bill before it, handle it as it pleases? As I understand, what Senators are afraid of and what we want to avoid if we can, is reposing too much power in the hands of the Appropriations Committee. The proposed new rule does add to their power, for it gives them the consideration of a greater number of appropriation bills, but at the same time, as I look at it, it takes away every particle of power that is in any wise dangerous.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is absolutely right, and that is the intention of the proposed rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But the Senator from Nebraska, I think, will agree with me that that is still subject to evasion. Under the first section of the proposed new rule, which is the same as the existing rule, if the Senate, for instance, had adopted a resolution authorizing an appropriation, even though that appropriation be contrary to existing law, it would be in order by way of amendment. That conclusion can not be escaped.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be in order by way of amendment in the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, the committee may offer an amendment as well as the Senator; so that we are in this curious situation, that in the framing of a bill the committee would not be allowed to put in an amendment carrying an appropriation which was contrary to existing law, but after the bill had been reported it could offer an amendment, notwithstanding the fact that it was contrary to existing law, if it had been authorized by resolution or bill adopted by the Senate or on motion of a standing or select committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but that would have to be done in the Senate; it would take place in the Senate; that is not a power that is given to the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all. Why should there be any more latitude in offering amendments given to Senators on a committee on the floor of the Senate than in framing the bill originally?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest to the Senator that if an amendment containing general legislation is offered it is still subject to a point of order and would have to go out?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not agree with the Senator as to that. The proposed rule makes an exception of items of appropriation authorized by resolution of the Senate. It says, in substance, "unless authorized by resolution."

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but if it is general legislation the second paragraph of the rule covers it. That paragraph provides that no general legislation shall be received on an appropriation bill if a point of order is made against it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The second paragraph does not cover it, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LENROOT. The second paragraph of the rule.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The second paragraph of the rule simply is an inhibition upon the committee in reporting the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; I said the second paragraph of the rule:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. "Unless" it contains a proviso.

Mr. LENROOT. No; it contains no proviso. I am speaking of the second paragraph of the existing rule, Rule XVI, not the paragraph of the rule that is before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. The rule as to general legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, that is subject to the exception and proviso in the first paragraph of the rule.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no. It has been uniformly held that if any amendment is in fact general legislation, even though reported by a committee and even though estimated for, it is subject to a point of order and must go out.

Mr. LODGE. That is the rule to-day.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is not the rule as stated in the proposed rule which we are now considering.

There is another thing that I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming. What is meant in this rule by "new legislation"?

> The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new * * * legislation.

Every appropriation bill is new legislation. The bill itself is new legislation.

Mr. WARREN. No; the idea is that it would be new legislation in that particular bill. That would make it legislation that would be new.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We can not pass an appropriation bill without enacting new legislation. Every item of the appropriation is new legislation. The bill itself is legislation.

Mr. WARREN. No; the bill itself simply provides money for carrying out the provisions of bills already passed and called for under the law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator certainly will admit that an appropriation bill is legislation—a legislative act?

Mr. WARREN. Only so far as it is allocating the money in the Treasury to carry out the laws of the Congress. That is what it should be, and that is what it is intended to be. That there has been legislation on appropriation bills is true, and especially during war times; but it has always been in the power of anyone on the Senate floor or the House floor to stop it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I assume that what is meant by it is that it should not be such legislation as to change existing law.

Mr. WARREN. It should not create legislation; that is it, exactly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But it seems to me the expression "new legislation" is rather inappropriate.

Mr. LODGE. The House phrase is "changing existing law."

Mr. POINDEXTER. I want to call attention to a definition of a budget, in so far as it applies to legislative matters, contained in the Century Dictionary:

> In Great Britain the annual financial statement which the chancellor of the exchequer makes in the House of Commons, sitting as a committee of ways and means. In making this statement the minister gives a view of the general financial policy of the Government, and at the same time presents an estimate of the probable income and expenditure for the following 12 months, and a statement of what taxes it is intended to reduce or abolish or what new ones it may be necessary to impose.

The use of the word "budget" as applied to government grows out of the practice of the Parliament of Great Britain and of the House of Commons, and the definition which I have just read describes it very succinctly. The so-called budget which we have established is nothing more or less than a request on the part of the executive branch of the Government for certain allowances from the appropriating branch of the Government, which is Congress. So far as economy is concerned, there is just as much importance in the expenditure of the money as there is in its appropriation, and the expenditure of the money is a function of the executive branch of the Government; and the creation of a so-called Budget Director is undoubtedly meritorious legislation, inasmuch as the purpose of it and perhaps to a large extent under competent and energetic officials the result of it would be to tend, at least, toward economical expenditure of the money appropriated by Congress by the various expending officers, the various executive branches of the Government.

Congress, however, ought not to fall into the error of putting that upon a legislative basis or upon a governmental basis of the budget in the sense in which that term is discussed in the country. In the true sense in which the word is used, it grows out of the action of the Parliament of Great Britain, which is the branch of that Government which controls the finances of the nation. The tendency of any such definition by Congress would be to transfer the control of the finances of the country, the great governmental function of raising money by taxation—because it is inextricably involved with the expenditure of that money—and of the purposes for which the money so raised shall be used, from the representative branch of the Government, composed of Members of the two branches of the legislature elected by the people, and to vest it in an organization of bureaus and officials and secretaries who are not chosen by the people, who have no immediate and direct responsibility to the people, as especially the House of Representatives has, and as to only a less degree the Senate has. It seems to me that the very jealous policy on the part of Congress ought to be to retain this power in its own hands, and, if we are to have a budget committee, that that budget ought to contain an estimate and a description of the amount which shall be raised for supplying the needs of the Treasury.

Mr. President, about a year ago I introduced a joint resolution which I will read. It is very brief. I introduced it on April 12, 1921:

> That a budget committee is hereby created, which shall consist of three Members to be appointed by the Senate and three Members to be appointed by the House of Representatives.

I am not sure whether or not a joint congressional committee could be arranged under our system of government, but that is merely a detail.

> It shall be the duty of this committee to meet in joint session promptly upon the convening of each session of Congress, or at such times as the members thereof may determine during the recess of Congress, or while Congress is in session, and examine into the prospective revenues of the Government for the next ensuing fiscal year and to estimate the total amount of the same, and to make recommendations to Congress relative to the amount of such revenue. Said committee shall further, either before or as soon as possible after the convening of each regular session of Congress, prepare a program of allotment of the moneys which may be available in the Treasury for appropriation for the maintenance of the expenses and activities of the Government during the ensuing fiscal year, stating in such program of allotment the total amount of money which will be available thereunder for appropriation for each of the several branches and activities of the Government. It shall be the purpose and object of the said committee to recommend to Congress such total amount of revenue as will be reasonably necessary and proper, considering the resources and the needs of the Nation, and to apportion the same among the different departments of the Government and the various Government activities and agencies in accordance with the reasonable needs and service of the said several departments, activities, and agencies, on such basis as that the total appropriations and expenditures of the Government shall be kept within the estimated revenues of the Government, and that the total appropriations made by Congress and dealt with by the various appropriation committees of Congress shall not exceed the Government income, and that the relative amount allowed to each department, agency, or activity shall bear a due relation to the total amount of appropriations and income of the Government, and shall bear a due relation and proportion to the amount recommended in said program for the various other departments, activities, and agencies of the Government, considering their several needs and work in due proportion and relation to each other, and to the entire Government income and expenditures.

It may be that such a proposal ought to be initiated in the House of Representatives, in view of the fact that under the Constitution all revenue measures must originate there, and, under the practice, which is practically as strong as law, appropriation bills must originate there. Until, however, we do devise some such system as that, by which the branch of the Government which under the Constitution controls the Nation's purse can adjust the total expenditure to the total income and take a comprehensive survey of the various grand divisions of the Government and estimate the amounts which ought to be expended by those various departments and branches in view of the revenue which we are to receive and the sources from which that revenue is to come, we shall not have any true budget system. I think that sooner or later we shall come to that, and, with all due deference and respect for the great experience of the Senator from Minnesota, I do not agree with his statement that a budget system can not be adapted to our form of government.

The Senator speaks about parliamentary government in other nations. We have a parliamentary government here. Certainly in so far as that vast range of jurisdiction provided by the Constitution and vested in Congress goes it is a parliamentary Government. Why can not this great parliament of the greatest Nation in the world, with the comprehensive jurisdiction given to it under the Constitution, have a parliamentary organization by which it can take the proper sort of survey of the sources of its income and make the proper sort of calculation as to how that income should be allotted to the various divisions of expenditure? It can be done. All that is needed is to appoint a parliamentary agency for that purpose.

There is one more matter to which I want to call attention, adverted to in part by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. He spoke of the confused system already in effect in the Senate under which appropriations are made. Some appropriations for military purposes are made by the Committee on Military Affairs and others are made by the Committee on Appropriations. There is one custom which he did not mention which contributes to that condition of affairs and to the confusion, and I may say inefficiency, which results from it, and that is the custom of passing deficiency appropriation bills.

I remember, during the war, when in the enthusiasm of that great appeal to the patriotism of the people we lost all sense of the value of money, and under the name of deficiency appropriation bills millions of dollars of money were appropriated, almost without protest or without examination, upon the request of some bureau of the Government, which afterwards showed by the manner in which it used the money that it did not know a great deal about what it was talking about. The Appropriations Committee recommended such appropriations for the most technical branches of the military service, for various kinds of ordnance, and for the most scientific and difficult divisions of the naval service. They did not confine themselves to making appropriations.

A good deal of the difficulty we have had from time to time with the military laws, including in that term the naval laws, came from the invasion by the general Appropriations Committee of the field of military and naval legislation in connection with the appropriation bills, of which that committee assumed jurisdiction for those branches of the service. We had a great deal of trouble not many months ago, resulting almost in a state of demoralization in the Naval Academy at Annapolis, because of the existence of a statute which took out of the hands of the academic staff of the academy the power to separate from the institution midshipmen who could not pass the examinations, those who were inefficient and deficient, because the Appropriations Committee put into one of their appropriation bills a provision which nobody was informed about probably but themselves, as very little attention was paid to it, which was passed upon the floor of the Senate without attention, and practically tied the hands of the Navy Department and the Naval Academy officials in the proper administration of that great educational institution. Fortunately the vices of that enactment were so obvious that it was soon repealed and the situation has already been remedied.

Mr. WARREN. Was that in a naval appropriation bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was in an appropriation bill which came from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. What bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I believe it was in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Of course it was.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will mention a similar case which came from the Appropriations Committee. It was in regard to a law retiring all temporary and reserve officers of the Navy and Marine Corps who served during the war on the same terms and conditions under which Regular officers of the Navy were retired.

Mr. WARREN. That must have been in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was in an appropriation bill which came from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. No; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. LENROOT. When was that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was in the 1920 bill. I do not remember which one of the appropriation bills it was.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will find it was in a naval appropriation bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My recollection is it came from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. No; the Senator is mistaken about that. The same thing was done at West Point which the Navy attempted to do at Annapolis, in order to get more men into the field; but as to the academy at Annapolis, it was a Navy move entirely. I think very likely it was in a naval appropriation bill. It must have been in the regular naval appropriation bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think I am correct in my recollection that it came from the Committee on Appropriations. However, I will look into that and refresh my memory on the subject. I think, in so far as the consolidation of appropriations in one committee is concerned, it would be of very great advantage and remedy the evils to which I referred a moment ago.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am for this proposed change of the rules. It is a necessity under the law of the Budget and the arrangements made by the House.

I desire to propose simply a small amendment, which I think only carries out the purpose of the proposed rule. I will give it as applying to only one case. It can be carried out in the others. On page 2, line 16, after the word "appropriations," I move to insert the following words:

At least one member of the Committee on Agriculture shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if that amendment is considered necessary, I hope it may be adopted, because it proposes to do what will be done in every single case if the present Committee on Appropriations is to handle the matter.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would probably be the practice, but I believe it would be better to put it in the rule, and I am glad the chairman has no objection to it. As I suppose the resolution will have to go over I ask the Secretary if he will make a similar amendment applying to each of the committees mentioned and have it printed, so that we can have it in the morning.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not take action upon this amendment this afternoon. I am in favor of an amendment along that line.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts does not ask that action be taken this afternoon on it.

Mr. LODGE. I do not ask that action be taken now. I want it to go over, but of course if a substitute is to be offered we have a right to perfect the original resolution first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The amendment will be printed.

Mr. LODGE's amendment was reduced to writing, as follows:

On page 2, line 16, after the word "appropriations," insert the following:

", and at least one member of the Committee on Agriculture shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Agricultural appropriation bill";

On page 2, line 22, after "appropriations," insert the following:

", and at least one member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Post Office appropriation bill";

On page 3, line 3, after the word "appropriations," insert the following:

", and at least one member of the Committee on Military Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of War";

On page 3, line 9, after the word "Appropriations" insert:

"And at least one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of the Navy";

On page 3, line 16, after the words "Department of War," insert:

"And at least one member of the Committee on Commerce shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon items pertaining to rivers and harbors contained in the bill making appropriations for the Department of War";

On page 3, line 24, after the words "Department of State and Justice," insert:

"And at least one member of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House when the items pertaining to the diplomatic and consular service are being considered in the bill making appropriations for the Department of State and Justice."

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 24, after the word "Justice," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon and add the following words:

And that the chairman of the committee on the District of Columbia, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the items pertaining to the District of Columbia are being considered by the Committee on Appropriations in the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARREN. Let the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is another amendment which I think everyone will agree is necessary. Yesterday I asked the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who was talking on the bill at that time, whether, if an appropriation bill came from the House which contained legislation and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Appropriations could report it back with that legislation on it without violating this rule. The Senator from Kansas said they had discussed that question in the committee and concluded that the Chair would not construe that it would violate the rule.

Mr. LODGE. The House ought not to do it, in my judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. I know the House should not do it, and perhaps the House never will do it; I do not know as to that, but I want to guard against what may happen. It might be done by unanimous consent over there, and it would, as I understand it, make it impossible, as I view this rule, for the Committee on Appropriations to report it at all; we never could get anywhere; we would be stumped. The language is as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation.

If that language means anything, it makes no exception; it does not make any difference whether the legislation was put in the bill originally by the House or whether it was put in by the Senate committee. It seems to me we can obviate that, and I would like to propose an amendment to the amendment for consideration when we get the resolution reprinted, to insert on page 2, after line 4, the words "amendment to an," so that it would read:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an amendment to an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer, which I would like to have read and printed. The object of this amendment is to allow the bill to go to the Appropriations Committee, but where there are matters included in the appropriation bill which would be appropriately referred to the Commerce Committee, for instance, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee shall appoint a committee of three out of the Appropriations Committee, and the entire Committee on Commerce shall act as ex officio members of the Appropriations Committee to consider the measure. In other words, instead of having three members of the Commerce Committee and the whole Appropriations Committee, as under the proposed rule, I would like to see it arranged to have a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, consisting of three, and all the Committee on Commerce to consider such propositions. I ask that the amendment be read.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not sure but what I did so yesterday, but I give notice that at the proper time I shall move to strike out of the resolution the proviso commencing on line 9, page 2, and all the balance of the resolution. In other words, I want to strike out of the rule everything which provides for the shifting over to the Committee on Appropriations of three members from the various other committees on certain bills which heretofore have had charge of those bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The READING CLERK. Strike out all after line 9 on page 2 and insert the following:

However, when appropriations for rivers and harbors are being considered by such committee, the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Commerce as ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Department of Agriculture are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Agriculture as ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations as ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Department of War are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Military Affairs as ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for Indian affairs are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs as ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Department of the Navy are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs as ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Post Office Department are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads as ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the District of Columbia are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of said committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia as ex-officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriation.

When a bill making appropriations enumerated in this paragraph is in conference, at least two such ex-officio members who considered such bill shall be appointed as conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to present an amendment intended to be proposed by me. I ask that it may be read and ordered printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The READING CLERK. Insert at the end of the proposed rule the following:

When an appropriation bill is under consideration by the Senate debate shall be confined to the bill, unless otherwise ordered by unanimous consent. A point of order that a Senator is not speaking to the bill shall be decided by the Presiding Officer, and an appeal from his decision shall be decided without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to modify the amendment which I proposed awhile ago. I have had my attention called to the fact by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and also the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that the amendment I have proposed to the committee amendment does not exactly fit the language, and it will have to be changed. I want to add two words in the committee amendment in two different places.

After the word "containing," in line 5 on page 2, I move to insert the words "amendments proposing," and after the word "containing," at the end of line 6, insert the same words, "amendments proposing," so that it will read:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report any appropriation bill containing amendments proposing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing amendments proposing new or general legislation a point of order may be made against the bill—

And so forth.

I ask that this amendment to the committee amendment may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate in legislative session took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, March 3, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Hon. William Tyler Page, Clerk of the House, who read the following communication from the Speaker:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1922.

I hereby designate Hon. JOSEPH WALSH, of Massachusetts, to act as Speaker pro tempore March 2 and 3.

F. H. GILLETT.

Mr. WALSH took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, we are led into the reality of this new day by Thy mercies which pour from the infinite heart into the veins of humanity. O hear us and give to all who enter this Chamber to feel the joy of divine security. Make us all to be happy and to enter into the spirit of Thy love and be not sore of heart. Always enable us to be patient, big of mind, noble in charity, and true to Thee, but never with a regretful sense of loss or pain. Do Thou keep on enlarging our spheres of usefulness and unto Thee be the praise forever. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT FROM SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON READJUSTMENT OF THE PAY OF THE ARMY, NAVY, ETC.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the law and by direction of the committee I submit a report of the Joint Committee on the Adjustment of the Pay of the Army, Navy, and Other Services.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois submits a report from the Joint Special Committee, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MCKENZIE. from the Special Committee, appointed in accordance with the provisions of section 16 of the act approved May 18, 1920, submitted the following report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the report will be printed and lie upon the Speaker's table pending the appointment of a special House committee, to which the report will probably be referred.

Mr. MANN. Can not it be referred to the special committee when appointed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order may be entered, the Chair thinks. The Chair will order the report referred to the special committee when appointed by the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 10185) authorizing the exchange of lands within the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the legislative bill (H. R. 10267).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the conference report on the legislative appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 14, 15, 20, 21, 22, 25, and 26.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 16, 18, 23, and 27, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out line 7 of the matter inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$3,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$35,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$9,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$92,985"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon amendments numbered 5, 6, and 28.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

On Nos. 1 to 4, inclusive, relating to the Senate: Appropriates for an additional laborer at $720 per annum in the office of the Secretary, as proposed by the Senate; appropriates for a special assistant to the Committee on Finance at $3,000 per annum, as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 7 to 10, inclusive, relating to the Senate: Appropriates $2,500 on account of an automobile for the Vice President, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $2,240, as proposed by the House; fixes the maximum rate of compensation to stenographers to committees at 25 cents per 100 words, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $1.25 per printed page, as proposed by the House; appropriates $100,000, as proposed by the Senate, for expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, instead of $50,000, as proposed by the House, and appropriates $30,000, as proposed by the Senate, on account of the Senate kitchens and restaurants.

On No. 11: Appropriates $3,500 on account of salaries and expenses of the Public Buildings Commission, instead of $10,000, as proposed by the Senate, and strikes out the words "and to remain available until expended."

On Nos. 12 and 13, relating to the Senate Office Building: Appropriates $55,654, as proposed by the Senate, for maintenance, etc., instead of $39,440, as proposed by the House, and appropriates $7,500 for furniture, furnishings, etc., as proposed by the Senate, instead of $5,000, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 14 to 27, inclusive, relating to the Library of Congress: Strikes out the position of inspector of stacks, at $1,500 per annum, proposed by the Senate; appropriates $3,000 for temporary services, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $2,500, as proposed by the House; appropriates $35,000 for the legislative reference service, instead of $25,000, as proposed by the House, and $45,000, as proposed by the Senate; includes provision for postage in the appropriation for distribution of card indexes, as proposed by the Senate; appropriates $9,000 for contingent expenses of the library, instead of $8,000, as proposed by the House, and $10,000, as proposed by the Senate; restores the paragraph for salaries under "Library buildings and grounds," as proposed by the House, with the single exception that it appropriates for an additional elevator conductor at $720 per annum, as proposed by the Senate; strikes out the paragraph proposed by the Senate for a force of employees under the Architect of the Capitol on account of the Library Building; and appropriates $6,000 on account of storage of catalogue cards, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $5,000, as proposed by the House.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the following amendments of the Senate:

On Nos. 5 and 6, relating to the compensation of the chief telephone operator.

On No. 28, relating to printing and binding for the Architect of the Capitol.

J. G. CANNON,
SYDNEY ANDERSON,
JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk the following statement to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in his time. Without objection, the Clerk will read the statement.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill as passed by the House carried	$12,392,610.95
The bill as passed by the Senate carried	12,530,724.95
An increase of	138,114.00

The Senate added 28 amendments to the bill, 16 of which occasioned the increase of $138,114. Of the increase, $102,694 is on account of the Senate, and on all of these the House conferees receded.

Of the remainder of the increase, or $35,420, the Senate receded from $18,400, occasioning the appropriation of $16,720 more than the House had proposed, if the conference report be adopted.

This $16,720 is distributed as follows:

1. Public Buildings Commission	$3,500
2. Temporary services, Library of Congress	500
3. Legislative reference service	10,000
4. Contingent expenses of the Library of Congress	1,000
5. Elevator conductor, Library Building	720
6. Storage of catalogue cards, Library of Congress	1,000

If the conference report be adopted, therefore, the bill will carry $119,414 more than when passed by the House, with $300 still to be disposed of by reason of an amendment not agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 5: On page 7 of the bill, line 5, strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in that amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell us what the $300 is for?

Mr. CANNON. It is to pay the chief telephone operator $300.

Mr. GARNER. Well, does this make the permanent salary $1,800 instead of $1,500?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. The House has already passed a resolution providing for it.

The question was taken, and the motion to recede and concur was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 6: Page 7, line 13, strike out "$154,280" and insert "$154,580."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this is simply a change in the total. I move that the House recede and concur.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 28: Page 35 of the bill, line 21, after the word "sum" insert "and the Public Printer is hereby authorized to furnish, upon requisition of the Secretary of the Senate, such printing and binding as may be necessary for the official use of the Architect of the Capitol."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in this Senate amendment with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, before the period at the end of said amendment, the following: "to cost not exceeding $250."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose some one official has to do this, so naturally the Senate added the amendment providing the requisition should be made by the Secretary of the Senate?

Mr. CANNON. That is the reason they gave.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it might just as well have been made by the Clerk of the House, but the Senate just again assumed that it is the legislative body.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois this question: This is in keeping with the method outlined in this bill when they have hogged $102,000 for themselves and which we are compelled to agree to on account of the courtesy between the two Houses?

Mr. MANN. It is not a question of courtesy between the two Houses. This is a question of the requisition by the Secretary of the Senate for printing for the Architect of the Capitol, who is just as much under the jurisdiction of the House as he is of the Senate; and yet I apprehend it would not be desirable that both the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House should be required to go through the form of making a requisition totaling, at the outside, $250.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois this question: He has been here a long time, and he recalls, I assume, the number of times that the Senators have increased their clerical force as they saw fit. Here is $102,000. Just how long is the House going to continue to permit the Senate extravagantly to expend the money belonging to the people of the United States?

We try here sometimes to practice economy, but it seems to me neither House when it is in power thinks itself extravagant. They should cease practicing extravaganee in the other body.

Mr. MANN. It is a good deal like the relations that exist between a husband and wife. In well-regulated families the wife determines what she will spend.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. SPROUL, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1922.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill reported yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10663, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. And pending that, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] if we can agree upon time for general debate?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that I have quite a number of requests, most of which I spoke to the gentleman about on yesterday.

Mr. MADDEN. In order to cut the camouflage out of it and not have it appear mysterious, suppose we agree on four hours?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman I do not think that will be sufficient time. I understood that the Commissioner from Porto Rico desires an hour, and I understand that the gentleman from Illinois is willing to yield to him 30 minutes of his time; in other words, 30 minutes on that side. I do not know whether I can get along with an hour and a half with these other requests or not. Could not the gentleman make it two hours and a half on a side?

Mr. MADDEN. That will make it pretty late.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We ought to get through with general debate to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that can be done.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Suppose we arrange to close debate at 5 o'clock?

Mr. GARNER. Why do you not make it five hours, not to extend beyond to-day?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The trouble with that is, if there happens to be two or three points of no quorum raised it will take a lot of time.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us make it 5 o'clock.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will agree to that.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four hours and a half, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate for the consideration of the deficiency bill extend for four hours and a half, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10663, the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10663, with Mr. SANDERS of Indiana in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10663, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in presenting the second deficiency bill for the consideration of the House I wish to call the attention of the House to the amount requested to be appropriated. That amount was $184,919,268.45. The amount recommended to be appropriated in the bill is $108,415,287.13, of which $239,887.99 is for the legislative branch, leaving $108,175,399.14 for the executive and judicial branches of the Government. Of the $108,175,399.14 for the executive and judicial branches of the Government, the sum of $93,993,112 is recommended for the Veterans' Bureau; $5,000,000 is recommended to make the initial payment to the Republic of Colombia under the treaty of April 6, 1914; $3,933,094.09 is recommended for the payment of judgments and audited claims. Deducting these sums, there remains of the amount recommended for the executive and judicial branches of the Government $5,249,193.05, which is distributed among nine executive departments, one independent establishment, and the District of Columbia. The items recommended in the $5,249,193.05, as a general rule, are small sums representing in most instances actual deficiencies incurred in prior fiscal years, or are for the maintenance of essential activities of the Government during the remainder of the current year. The committee has eliminated from the bill every item which was of doubtful status as a deficiency and has recommended only what they believe to be appropriations decidedly essential to the functioning of the activities of the Government concerned.

The amount recommended in the bill is $76,503,981.32 less than the amount requested in the estimates, and the principal items of this reduction are as follows:

Naval Establishment:
Clothing and small-stores fund	$40,328,740.42
Deficiencies, fiscal year 1921	4,695,156.25
Deficiencies, fiscal year 1922	15,174,924.99
		$60,198,821.66
Shipping Board, construction program		12,000,000.00
Department of Labor:
Children's Bureau, welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy	1,110,000.00
Employment Service	100,000.00
		1,210,000.00
Postal Service		311,414.52
Treasury Department, hospital construction		1,239,700.00
All other reductions		1,571,045.14
		76,503,981.32

I will explain these items a little later in detail.

The committee has not provided any direct appropriations for the Naval Establishment in this bill. The item of $40,328,740.42 requested to permit the reimbursement of the Treasury for expenditures during the war for articles of uniform and equipment in excess of the capital of the clothing and small-stores fund has been eliminated as a direct appropriation. The expenditures for this purpose during the war period exceeded the capital of the fund by approximately this sum. As the expenditures have been incurred, the necessity exists for the adjustment of the accounts of the Navy on the books of the Treasury Department, and this the committee has provided for.

The transaction is one of bookkeeping credit for past expenditures, and on that account the committee deemed it unwise to confuse the appropriation totals with a figure of appropriations that represents book credits for past transactions. Of the $4,695,156.25 requested on account of deficiencies for the fiscal year 1921 and prior years, the committee has provided $4,394,806.25, being the amount needed to pay outstanding obligations. This sum has been eliminated as a direct appropriation and a requirement inserted in the bill that the expenses allowed shall be defrayed from balances under other regular annual naval appropriations for the fiscal year 1921. Of the $15,174,924.99 requested on account of deficiencies for the fiscal year 1922, the committee has provided $10,000,000. The principal item in the request is $11,057,610.32 for fuel, of which the committee has recommended $6,282,865.33.

The appropriation for fuel for the Navy for the current year is $17,500,000. This sum, with the exception of $1,600,000, had been expended on December 31, 1921, and it is estimated by the Navy Department that the $1,600,000 was exhausted early in February. The sum allowed by the committee, on the basis of covering a period of five months, would allow approximately $1,250,000 per month for the remainder of the current year. If expenditures should be allowed for the remainder of the current fiscal year on the basis of the amount expended during the first six months, an appropriation for the entire year of $32,000,000 would have been required. The fuel appropriation for the year 1916 was approximately $5,500,000. I would like to have the committee note this. The amount for the current year, if the $6,282,685.33 is approved, will be $23,782,865.33.

The committee has inserted a requirement that the $10,000,000 allowed for the fiscal year 1922 shall be paid from unobligated balances under other regular annual naval appropriations for that fiscal year and specifically enumerated balances under certain continuing appropriations. They have also further required that the amounts allowed for the fiscal year 1922 shall only be expendable to the extent that balances may be found in other naval appropriations with which to meet them. The 1922 balances stated to be available aggregate $532,627. The specific balances enumerated under continuing appropriations and made available aggregate $7,147,718. These two sums total $7,680,345. The items for 1922 to be payable from existing balances existing, or which may exist in the 1922 appropriations, aggregate $10,000,000. It will be necessary, therefore, for the Navy Department, in order to avail itself of the full amount of the $10,000,000 of 1922 items allowed, to effect economies or to curtail activities under other appropriations in an amount aggregating $2,319,655.

The committee is of the opinion that the Navy Department should conform to this requirement and should conduct the Navy during the remainder of this fiscal year in such a manner that the original appropriation made for this fiscal year of $410,673,289.23, supplemented by the other balances allowed, will be sufficient to cover all necessary obligations. In other words, the committee believes that we ought not to increase the aggregate of the appropriations for the year. [Applause.]

The Shipping Board requested an appropriation of $12,000,000 for the completion of vessels under construction and for expenses incident to the termination of construction work. The request, upon consideration by the chairman of the Shipping Board, was withdrawn, but I may say here in passing that it was withdrawn only after the committee itself had proved conclusively by the witnesses of the Shipping Board that not under any circumstances should there be appropriated in connection with the request for $12,000,000 a sum in excess of $2,000,000, and that there was some doubt about the wisdom of that. The Shipping Board finally decided itself, as the result of our examination of the witnesses, that they had not made a case—we had decided that before they did—and so we do not recommend the $12,000,000 or any part of it.

The estimate of the Children's Bureau for carrying into effect the provisions of the act for the promotion of welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy was $1,480,000, the amount authorized for the full fiscal year. The committee has allowed the sum of $370,000, which is one-fourth of the estimate on the pro rata basis of the portion of the fiscal year remaining when the money will become available, approximately April 1.

A limitation has been placed upon the portion of the fund to be expended for administrative purposes, prohibiting any salary at a rate in excess of $2,400 per annum, except one at $3,600, one at $3,500, and one at $3,000; and I might add that even these $2,400 salaries are to be paid to doctors. I might also say in this connection that those who appeared for the bureau seemed to think that because the law provided for an annual appropriation of $1,480,000, even though there might be but 30 days of the year yet remaining, that they would be entitled to the entire $1,480,000. But the committee did not agree with that. The committee believed that the proper proportionate amount of the authorized sum should be given, a sum commensurate with that portion of the year that is yet to run; and since there will be but three months of the year to run when this appropriation becomes available, we provided $120,000 for one fourth of the year out of the $480,000, and $250,000 for a like period out of the $1,000,000, making in all $370,000.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. My recollection of the act is that there was apportioned a set sum for each State that did not have to be matched. That was for the first year.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Only six States have positively accepted. There are 31 States in which they have had communication with the governors, and, so far as the governors could commit them, 25 of those States, in addition to the 6 I have just mentioned, have accepted the provisions of the act. But, of course, a governor's acceptance is only tentative, depending upon the final action of the legislature.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Take a State which, through the legislative branch of its government, has accepted. Do I understand that its proportion will be only 25 per cent of the $10,000?

Mr. MADDEN. For this year.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Of course, this is the only year when the $10,000 will be appropriated. Next year it will be $5,000.

Mr. MADDEN. The money can not be paid to a State unless there is an acceptance. That is a very clear proposition, and the law is mandatory and provides that the appropriation must be for the fiscal year. What is the fiscal year? It begins on the 1st of July and ends on the 30th of June, and any construction of the fiscal year can not mean three months, no matter what anybody may think about it, and the committee, after giving very careful study to the law, decided that it would not have the power to do the thing that I think is suggested by the question of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The only thing is that it cuts down the initial appropriation so as really not to accomplish what was in the mind of the committee when the bill was drafted.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not cut it down for the portion of the fiscal year the appropriation has to run.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I was of the opinion that the States accepting would get additional payments.

Mr. MADDEN. Only six of them have accepted.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Six of them have.

Mr. MADDEN. And we have provided for each of them being paid one-fourth of $10,000, or $2,500. We have appropriated $120,000 to be expended in this manner. With this reduced sum, if each State that has accepted were paid $10,000, there might not be enough remaining to satisfy other acceptances.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I see you have an appropriation here of $50,000 for the Agricultural Department for the inspection of cars coming out of Mexico to prevent the coming in of the pink bollworm. Is that the amount asked for?

Mr. MADDEN. That is the amount that was asked for.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I was under the impression that it was $100,000.

Mr. MADDEN. No; that is the amount that was asked for, if I recollect correctly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am not positive about it. That was my impression.

Mr. MADDEN. The sum of $93,993,112 is recommended for the Veterans' Bureau, of which $73,714,182 is for vocational training for the balance of the year, and $20,278,930 is for medical and hospital services.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly, if the gentleman will wait just a moment. If these sums are allowed the total for each of these purposes for this fiscal year will be as follows: Vocational training, $178,714,182; medical and hospital services, $78,278,930.

In this connection attention is directed to the table of expenditures on page 104 of the hearing, covering the total for all war-risk insurance purposes from the beginning to January, 1922, which indicates an aggregate expenditure for all purposes in connection with wounded and sick soldiers since the close of the war of $1,517,468,885. In addition to this, the Government has accepted a contingent liability on insurance amounting to $1,240,000,000, extending over a period of 20 years, which is an annual obligation of $60,000,000. If we add the $1,240,000.000 to the $1,517,000,000, you see we have over $2,757,000,000 already provided for the care of the men who came back less well than when they went away, who served in the great World War. Now I am glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman has the information, will he please tell us how that amount of money compares with the amount expended by any other Government for its returned soldiers?

Mr. MADDEN. I regret to say that I can not give that. I have not had the time to look it up, but I shall be very glad to do so and inform the gentleman, but I think it much more than has been allowed by any other country.

Mr. SNELL. Has the gentleman any idea how it compares?

Mr. MADDEN. No certain figures. Now, I have explained the bill in its principal items, and I think it may be well enough, as the Navy proposition was the first important thing to which attention was called, to go a little more into detail in connection with the appropriation for the Navy fuel, and to explain more in detail, perhaps, how we reach the conclusion with respect to $40,000,000 and some odd hundred thousand dollars on account of the "clothing and small stores fund" of the Navy.

To begin, during the war the clothing and small stores account in the Navy, consisting, as it does, of clothing and other such equipment, was enlarged through purchases to more than $77,000,000. In 1921 the Congress passed a law directing that on first enlistment men in the Navy should be supplied their uniforms out of this fund or account without reimbursement thereto. The result of that law is that nearly $10,000,000 of the supplies then on hand have been taken out of store without any equivalent return. Later on the Navy Department took an inventory of its stock and wrote down the prices to meet the present cost level, and that occasioned a reduction of $30,000,000 in the values as represented by the purchase price during the war. It will be manifest to everybody that the Navy Department could not go on carrying a store of supplies represented at a cost of $77,000,000, when such supplies were worth only $37,000,000.

So, on the recommendation of the Navy Department, the Committee on Appropriations has in this bill recommended the authorization of book adjustments to be made between the Treasury Department and the Navy Department, which will give the Navy Department credit for the shrinkage in the value of the stores. That is what a man would do in his private business. He would write it off to profit and loss. In a Government institution you can not do that; you have to provide for the adjustment by law.

The Navy Department had deficiencies for transportation and freight and other things for 1921 of $4,600,000 and odd. They brought to our attention unexpended balances in other 1921 appropriations of something over $11,000,000. We have provided in this bill for the payment of these deficiencies for 1921 out of the unexpended balances in other naval appropriations for that year. It was suggested by the Navy that we might then take the remainder of the 1921 unexpended balances and apply them toward the payment of the additional appropriation for fuel which they requested for 1922, but the committee did not think that would be good business practice—it would be doing just what we are trying not to do. It would indicate an expense in one year that was incurred in another, an expenditure out of one year's appropriations for the expenses of another year, and it would complicate the situation so that you would not be able to tell what the appropriations for any one year were. It would not be good business practice, anyway. For 1922 they had some legitimate deficiencies, amounting to $3,700,000 and a little over, which we authorize to be paid out of the unexpended balances for 1922.

It may excite the curiosity of some Members of the House to know how we reached the conclusion that $6,283,000 was the amount which should be allowed for fuel. I shall explain it by saying that we deducted the amount of the other deficiencies from the $10,000,000 we agreed to allow and allotted to fuel what was left. That is how we reached the figure.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Was it necessary to authorize the application of an unexpended balance for the year 1921?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; you can not do it in any other way. There are some people who do not agree that we ought to touch those balances. The reason why we do it is this: We thought it was good business practice. If we had made a direct appropriation out of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated we would have added to the current year's expense of the Navy the amount of the appropriation, whereas by doing what we permit them to do—that is, charge the deficiencies to the balances unexpended in the appropriations for that year—we keep the total cost of the Navy within the appropriation as it was originally made. Of course, in the long run it might amount to the same thing, because these unexpended balances would go into the Treasury; but if we use them now they are not there, and they can not be used for other purposes. Sometimes it is a good thing not to have them there.

There has been some criticism—and I think it is only fair that we should meet that criticism—about the wisdom of what the committee recommends in connection with the fuel supply for the Navy. We are not thin-skinned about criticism and not averse to having criticism passed. If we can not meet the criticisms fairly, we are not entitled to support. We have no disposition whatever to embarrass anybody anywhere. We have but one object, and that object is to conserve the interests of the people. The Navy is a popular institution. It has means of reaching a great many people. It sometimes finds fault with what the Appropriations Committee does. They never get exactly what they want, because they always want a good deal more than they ought to have; and this is the first time in the history of my experience in Congress that we have not a pending war with Japan just about the time the Navy appropriation bill was under consideration. They could not raise the issue now because the Conference on the Limitation of Armament settled that question. Now they raise the question that they can not cruise their ships if we do not give them more money for fuel.

I want to tell you what they have had. I want to present both sides of the case fairly. I am not asking one thing or the other. I want the case to be presented to the House so that the Members of the House themselves will decide the question, and whatever they decide I shall be happy about it. I think it is our duty to give the facts.

For 1922 the original estimate submitted in connection with the naval bill for fuel was $37,000,000. That estimate was revised on the basis of 100,000 men and on the basis of two days at sea to one in port, and reduced to $34,982,000. The Congress allowed them $17,500,000 for fuel. The actual expenditures from July 1 to December 31, 1921, for fuel amounted to $15,896,821.23. The balance on hand January 1, 1922, was $1,603,178.77. The average monthly expenditure for the first six months for fuel in the Navy was $2,650,000. The expenditure for the month of December last was $1,850,000. The balance on hand January 1, 1922, was estimated at $1,600,000. The funds therefore required for February, March, April, May, and June, five months, are the funds with which we are concerned. The amount allowed in this bill for those five months is $6,282,685. This sum will average for each month of the five months $1,250,000. If allowed the total for the year would be $23,782,685. The amount allowed for fuel for the fiscal year 1916 for the Navy was $5,500,000. That is all they used. The expenditures for the fiscal year 1921 for fuel for the Navy amounted to $33,000,000. The average monthly expenditure for 1921 was $2,750,000. The original estimate for 1922 for fuel for the ships was based on oil at $3.85 per barrel. Fuel oil on the west coast is costing now from $1.48 to $2 per barrel. It should be remembered that these estimates were based on $3.85 per barrel.

The average cost on the west coast was about $1.70 per barrel. Practically all of the oil-burning ships in commission are on the west coast. Oil costs more on the east coast. It costs more because during the war the Navy made a contract with some oil company, I do not recall the name, which required the Navy to buy many, many million dollars' worth of oil over a given period. They could have canceled the contract, but it so happened that they advanced a lot of money to the oil company from whom they were to buy the oil, and the only way that they can get that money back is to buy the oil at the price fixed in the contract, and that is what they are doing now. Fuel oil on the east coast costs from $2.47 to $3.05 per barrel.

I want to say that in reaching the conclusion that $6,282,000 is the amount that we ought to give, we do so upon the theory that $1,250,000 for fuel to-day is equivalent to $2,500,000 for fuel in 1921.

Now, it is said by some of the people of the Navy that they will be compelled to keep the ships at anchor. Well, most of the ships are at anchor in times of peace anyway, and it will not hurt them right now if they are at anchor. I know as a result of an investigation and from expert testimony submitted to me by one of the best men in the Navy—I do not care to give his name—that the amount given in this bill for the Navy will be equivalent to the amount of fuel that can be used with all peace-time movements of ships without restriction by the Navy with a 60,000 personnel.

I have a suggestion for the Secretary of the Navy that it might be a good plan to begin to conform to the expectations for another year. I do not know what the size of the Navy will be next year and I do not suppose anybody does. But I do not think it is going to be as large as it is.

I do not think there will be as many men to operate as many ships, and not as much fuel, and I commend to the Secretary of the Navy this line of thought. I am going to make a suggestion, although for a landsman it may be risky to make suggestions to a seaman. I am going to say that if we should provide in the naval bill for 1923 for a force approximately of 60,000 men—I do not commit myself to any number, I am talking about probabilities—it necessarily must follow that a great many vessels now in commission must be laid up at suitable anchorage places, and should be laid up. If they are laid up they will have to have certain stores and equipage removed. They should have certain parts liable to rust well greased, and it might be necessary to apply paint to preserve the ships and machinery. That is what we do to machinery when we lay it up, and after the 1st of July the Navy will have neither enlisted men nor civilians—if the Navy is reduced to 60,000—sufficient to attend to these things. I am talking to the Secretary of the Navy. My suggestion is that there is no better way to employ the enlisted man to-day on vessels of the Navy which will be necessarily laid up during the remainder of the fiscal year by reason of the curtailed steaming fund than to put them to work conditioning the vessels which must lie idle during the next fiscal year. [Applause.] Do you not think it would be a good plan to have that done in advance? I advise the Secretary of the Navy to do this, and that is what any business man would do. I do not criticize the Secretary of the Navy or anybody else, I am only making suggestions of what would be wise and prudent. You know if you follow the dictates of the scientists of the Navy there would be no limitation. But there is somebody somewhere in the rugged corners of the agricultural regions, in every section of the Nation, pleading for reduction of expenses. Men in the mines, in the mills, in the shops, in the field, on the farms, are all looking to us to give them relief. These men that urge extravagant expenditures do not have to go to the people. They do not know the people; they would not know them if they met them. They do not associate with them. They do not have to realize the conditions of hardship that these people have to undergo to make a living. Personally I am very friendly to the Navy. I want the Navy to understand that we ought to try to get together and not stand so far apart. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I understand the gentleman to say that last year the bill appropriated $17,500,000 for the present fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. This year.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. How is it that the Navy has expended $17,500,000 when Congress intended it to last throughout the fiscal year?

Mr. MADDEN. I am going to talk a little about that in a minute. I think I have said all I need to say about the Navy. Now I want to say one thing about the Army.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. HILL. On page 27, under Naval Establishment, is an item for Navy nitrate plant.

Mr. MADDEN. That is for them to use——

Mr. HILL. We are considering Muscle Shoals.

Mr. MADDEN. That has nothing to do with Muscle Shoals.

Mr. HILL. Is there a nitrate plant in existence now?

Mr. MADDEN. No; this is the remainder of a fund created during the war for that purpose.

Mr. HILL. And there is no nitrate plant now?

Mr. MADDEN. No. Now I want to talk about the Army. The Secretary of War has been wonderful in his cooperation. He has not always agreed with us when we have suggested economies; he has kicked as hard as anybody; but if the thing was done he has been the first man to conform and has done wonderfully well. I want to compliment him. There has not been a chance that he could find anywhere that he has not economized.

Mr. MANN. I do not want my colleague to make any statement about it, but I notice that he did not make that statement about the Navy. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I have no criticism to make. Now, I think the worst enemy that the United States has is the deficiency fiend. We have a lot of them and it is hard to break them away from their habit. It is a habit of generations. It is ingrown in them. They do not know how to get rid of it. We are trying to pry them loose from it.

We are trying to educate them how to do things without spending more money than they get. Now, let me illustrate to you how many deficiencies happen. We will say we appropriate a million dollars for a given activity. That is the limit of cost for the activity for the year as fixed by the Congress. That is the law. The law embraced in an appropriation bill is just as sacred as the law embraced within the Constitution. It is made to be kept, and yet a great many department chiefs and bureau heads, when they get the appropriation for a million dollars, seem to forget the oath they took to obey the law and the Constitution and they commence to allot the $1,000,000 sometimes on a basis of $1,200,000. They will make a monthly allotment on the basis of $1,200,000, so that they will be sure not to make any mistake of not having enough. Instead of making allotments on the basis of $1,000,000 they make the allotments on the basis of $1,200,000, and they will spend up to the amount of the allotments and, of course, in the middle of the year they discover that they will be $200,000 short, and they come back for just exactly the amount of the excess of their allotments over the appropriation. We have notified them that when we make an appropriation it means that they are to live within it. [Applause.] And I want to notify them now publicly on the floor that in all cases where deficiencies are created that can be avoided—and there are some cases where they can not be avoided, there may be an emergency—fuel, for example, for the Navy, they are permitted to create a deficiency for fuel under the Revised Statutes, or for the pay of personnel or for subsistence of men in the Navy, and the same thing is true in the Army, but no one will justify the creation of a deficiency for additional clerks in civil activities beyond the amount that they are allowed in the appropriation.

And all such deficiencies as that I want to say from now on—really there have not been any of them allowed, I will say—but wherever they come, as long as I am chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for a deficiency that can not be justified by law or fact or reason, and where it is evident that they had no intention of living up to the law and where they evidently intended to flout the Congress and pay no attention to it, I propose, under the terms of the deficiency act that provides for the removal from office of anybody who creates a deficiency in violation of the act or for fine or imprisonment, to notify the President of the specific violator, giving his name and requesting him to take such action in all such cases as he may think proper. We can not discharge the men but we can call the attention of the President to the persistent and illegal violation of the appropriation acts by those who have charge of the expenditures.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. I am sure the House heartily approves of the stand of the chairman of the committee with regard to these deficiencies. I would like to ask how the general deficiencies of bureaus for this year compare with those made last year?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course deficiencies this year are large because of the necessity for a large amount of money for the veterans, but they have been running large right along since the war. Sometimes deficiencies come in here dating back a number of years—as, for instance, we have deficiencies for 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919—and we can not evade those or avoid them.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman thinks, as far as the active operation of Government departments is concerned, the deficiency is less than previously.

Mr. MADDEN. The bill only provides for $5,200,000 for deficiencies for the executive branch of the Government outside of the extraordinary things I have described.

Mr. SNELL. This is a small amount in this bill——

Mr. MADDEN. It is a small amount for a large bill.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. With regard to this question of Navy fuel. This is true, of course, in the Navy when an officer expends more than appropriated and creates a deficiency for fuel that the officer is not subject to removal?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. At the same time it is certainly intended under the law and by Congress that the appropriation for $17,500,000 for fuel during the year shall be apportioned during the year.

Mr. MADDEN. It was.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And that proportion shall be maintained, except in the case of an emergency. Does the Navy claim that there has been an emergency during the present year which has caused them to create a deficiency?

Mr. MADDEN. No; we have not been able to discover it. I do not know what they claim. Now, as to the veterans. I want to talk a little about them. We have a very interesting situation with respect to the appropriations for the Veterans' Bureau. It will be recalled that when we were here before with the deficiency bill we did not recommend what they asked for, because they were not able to give us the facts we would liked to have had in order to give the case intelligent treatment. Since that time a great many facts have been submitted that justify the hope, at least, that there is an honest effort being made to systematize the work. It is a tremendous job under any circumstance, and there will be mistakes made; there will be waste in different places; there will be extravagance; and there may be corruption. We do not know. We do not charge that there is, but I would not be surprised some time if it should be developed that there was. We have eighteen thousand two hundred and some-odd people in the service of the Veterans' Bureau. Thirteen thousand five hundred of those are in the divisional offices and suboffices, and five thousand and something here in the District of Columbia. There were 75,408 cases acted upon by the medical division of the War Risk Bureau in December, 1921—that is last December. Of this number 28,994 were general cases and 16,727 were tubercular. There were 52,272 cases rated by the medical division during December, 1921.

Thirty-six thousand three hundred and ninety cases were referred to the United States Public Health Service district superintendents in December, 1921, for examination, 19,913 cases awaiting action of the medical officers on January 1, 1922. There were 28,687 men receiving hospital treatment at the close of December, 1921; 28,563 Government beds were available at the close of December, 1921. Eighteen thousand of these were in the United States Public Health Service hospitals, 2,895 in Army hospitals, 3,398 in Navy hospitals, 3,278 in soldiers' homes, and 822 in St. Elizabeths. On the same date there were 8,784 unoccupied beds in Government hospitals, which would be equivalent to about 25 per cent of the total number of beds. It is said that 15 per cent surplus beds should be maintained continuously, because they are transferring patients in and out all the time.

There are 5,580 additional Government beds under construction or were being planned as of January 1, 1922, and this work, when completed, will provide 3,039 tubercular beds and 2,345 neuro-psychiatric beds and 196 general medical and surgery beds in addition to what we already have.

Four hundred and eighty-six thousand eight hundred and eighty-four men have requested vocational training to December 15, 1921, and during the period from December 1 to December 15, 12,769 were registered, compared with 19,178 in November and 23,825 in October.

And I want to say in this connection that the cost of vocational training per man per annum, including those who are not paid for taking vocational training, is $126 a month, or, substantially, $1,500 a year.

There were 299,879 men who have been declared eligible for vocational training; 135,947 have been declared ineligible after examination. Of the 299,879 declared eligible for training to December, 1921, 269,919 have been assigned to training. That does not mean they are in training. Of the 269,919 assigned to training to December 15, 1921, 137,068 have entered training; 48,602 men were in process of induction into vocational training on December 15, 1921.

On December 1 there were 48,899 in process of induction, and on November 1, 50,616. During the period of December 1 to 15, 1,848 entered training, compared with 4,145 for the month of November, 7,104 in October, and 5,491 in September. One hundred and four thousand five hundred and seventy-eight were undergoing vocational training December 15, 1921. Of this number 93,914 are receiving maintenance pay from the bureau, while 10,664 are receiving no maintenance pay. Up to December 15, 1921, 7,837 have completed vocational training. During the period of December 1 to 15, 388 completed training, compared with 691 in the month of November, 574 in October, and 278 in September.

To December 15, 1921, 18,842 had their training interrupted for one cause and another, some by death and sickness and some for other reasons.

Of the 104,578 men in training on December 15, 1921, 28,320 pursue business courses; 14,505 mechanical trades; 14,076 agricultural courses, and 10,573 professional courses. The trades courses being pursued embrace mechanical, metal, electrical, building, and advertising trades.

Seven thousand one hundred and twenty-nine employees were engaged in the rehabilitation service January 1, 1922.

Now, I have some figures I would like to read. There has been paid under the Veterans' Bureau in the war-risk section, from November 1, 1919, to December 31, 1921, inclusive, for salaries and expenses, $47,078,092; allotments and allowances, $582,954,236; vocational training, $212,724,533; compensation, $300,141,766; term insurance awards, $278,239,146; United States Government life-insurance awards, $5,047,459; hospitalization, $17,924,017; marine and seamen, $35,084,378; or a total of $1,479,193,630.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like about five minutes more.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Let me make this statement first:

From November 1, 1917, to January 1, 1922, 1,687,850 service men requested allotments and allowances. During this period 2,145,816 awards were made. The reason for the difference in the number of applications and the number of awards is that awards were made upon the application of wives and frequently Class A and Class B awards were made on the same application. So that you can see that there might be two awards easily on one application. The amount of $582,954,236.03 has been paid out in allotments and allowances to January 1, 1922, and of this amount $300,905,125.70 was allotments and $282,049,110.33 was allowances.

I give you these figures because it is frequently said that there is nothing being done for the men who served in the war and who came back sick. And I thought, inasmuch as a good many questions are being asked of Members of the Congress daily in respect to what is being done for these heroes who served the Nation in its hour of need, there ought to be some information in concrete form that the Members can refer to as reliable.

These figures that I have given you are the exact facts, and they tell the story of a Nation's gratitude as no other statement could tell it. We are grateful to these men for what they have done. The Nation stands with hands aloft, beckoning and inviting these men who wear the badge of honor, which comes from a fallen limb or some shattered part of the body, to partake of the generosity of the Nation, not in the nature of charity, but in the nature of a desire on the part of the American people to recognize the merit that service proved on the part of these patriotic men. [Applause.] It is sometimes said that we are not doing anything for them. I think they themselves ought to know what is being done. Many of them do not. These figures tell the story, and I want you to repeat it and pass it on.

Now I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand it, it costs $129 a month per man?

Mr. MADDEN. One hundred and twenty-six dollars on the average?

Mr. SNELL. Does that include the pay to the man himself?

Mr. MADDEN. It includes pay. It includes pay of $100 a month. A good many men do not get pay, but in cases like that we have to pay $50 a month tuition, so that in all it costs $126 per man.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. What evidence, if any, has been disclosed in the committee hearings as to the need of hospital buildings?

Mr. MADDEN. We have figures here showing that there are 7,700 surplus beds. If there is any evidence needed to show that we do not need beds, that is the evidence.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield.

Mr. LONDON. I am receiving many letters every day from my district, principally from teachers and parents of school children, who have evidently been advised by the teachers to write me, complaining that the soldiers do not get sufficient hospital facilities.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no complaint anywhere on that ground. The complaint generally comes from the outside. Of course, I would not undertake to say that some poor, unfortunate man who went to the other side and was shell-shocked and became nervous, and thereby became more or less discontented, or some man afflicted with tubercular trouble, has not received the attention he desires. There are always some who are more or less discontented, and it is the purpose of the authorities to do everything they can to make them as contented as possible.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman has looked into the facts, and he is satisfied that everything is being done that could be done?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I do not think you could do any more, no matter how hard you tried. You can not satisfy everybody, because there are conditions under which some will not be satisfied.

Mr. LONDON. There are enough beds?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; something like 7,700 surplus. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used one hour and seven minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA]. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will yield to him the same amount of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico is recognized for one hour.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of my remarks I ask that the Clerk read in my time a communication which I have received from Porto Rico.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Cablegram.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 26, 1922.

Hon. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The governor appointed the same persons who had been rejected as soon as the senate adjourned. Great public indignation exists. I am doing everything in my power to contain despairing attitude of the people, fearing lest it may undo the good work we have just completed. We are all about to lose faith.

BARCELÓ,
President of the Senate.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, I arise to-day to perform a duty that is far from a pleasant one to me. But my sacred obligations to the good people of Porto Rico, who are responsible for my presence in this body, as well as my obligations to the United States, of which I am a willing and proud citizen, forbid me to longer remain silent.

I arise to protest against and ask relief from the acts of an unprincipled, un-American, and altogether unfitted administrator, Gov. E. Mont Reily, of Porto Rico. His oft-repeated abuses of power and his systematic insults to a friendly people have finally made this man intolerable to the people of the island.

Strange to say, Gov. Reily has selected that portion of Porto Ricans who are the best element in the island as the object of his spleen and vindictiveness. And that is by far the greater portion of the people of Porto Rico.

E. Mont Reily, instead of devoting his time to the administration of the affairs of the country with sound judgment and impartiality of views, as was to be expected from a presidential appointee to the high office of executive of the island, has indulged in a policy of partisanship, and for the first time during the history of the American administration the office of the governor has been converted into a political club. This office is now the headquarters of small and cheap politicians, who have grasped the opportunity and obtained from the governor the support denied them by the people at the general elections.

Therefore to Porto Ricans such as myself, and there are many of them, indeed, the spectacle of an American governor in Porto Rico insulting and ignoring the friends of his own native land and championing those who brag of their bolshevik ideas and claim affiliation with the Third Internationale of Moscow, adds insult to injury to the last extreme.

Nor is it in my purpose to cast reflection upon any of the national political parties. I am neither a Republican nor a Democrat in the sense of continental party affiliation, for we do not have the same issues in Porto Rico that you have here. I am a loyal American citizen, and therefore I do not yield to anyone in my loyalty and respect for the President of the United States.

I believe that President Harding made a mistake in the appointment of the governor. Reily cunningly suppressed his past record, and therefore the President appointed him without the least malice toward the people of Porto Rico. I have such great confidence in President Harding that I believe if we could know his innermost convictions we would find that he, too, is about convinced that this man is unfit to govern a people.

HOW REILY BEGAN HIS ADMINISTRATION AS GOVERNOR.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have exhausted all our means to obtain the removal of the governor by the administration. Unfortunately, we have failed in our efforts, and Gov. Reily has returned to Porto Rico with the support of the President. It seems to me that the administration has not realized the seriousness of the situation, and as we have been unable to convince the President of the justice of our cause I appear before you to ask for a congressional investigation which will expose to public view the general reputation and conduct of Gov. E. Mont Reily in Porto Rico. To accomplish the removal of this man, whose every act has shown him wholly unfit to govern the island, no course is left to us but to bring the matter before Congress. I wish to make it clear, however, that this step is taken only after the administration was given free opportunity to act.

In order to form an opinion of the personality of E. Mont Reily it is necessary to take into consideration a multitude of details which, if considered separately, may appear of minor importance, but which jointly investigated will give an approximate idea of the mentality, temperament, and idiosyncrasy of the man who is at present the ruler of the island.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I understood from the cablegram that you had read that the officers whom the governor had appointed last had been appointed before that and that the Senate had refused to confirm them. Is that true?

Mr. DAVILA. They were appointed during the recess. The governor submitted the names to the senate, which was convened for the special purpose of considering his nominations, and the senate refused to confirm them. He reappointed them immediately upon the adjournment of the senate in defiance of the organic act and of the wishes of the people of Porto Rico, as expressed through their accredited representatives, and that is proof of the unfitness of the governor. His action is an insult to the people of Porto Rico. I am fighting him more as an American than as a citizen of the island. He is more of an enemy of the people of the United States than of the island and his conduct demands his removal.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. By what majority did the senate decline to accept the governor's appointments?

Mr. DAVILA. I understand it was by a vote of 15 against and 3 in favor.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The senate voted 15 to 3 not to ratify the appointments?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Then the governor reappointed them?

Mr. DAVILA. He reappointed them immediately after the adjournment of the session of the senate.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Has the Senate of Porto Rico signified that it would not confirm anyone whom the governor should name?

Mr. DAVILA. Oh, no; nothing of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Were these appointees Americans or were they Porto Ricans?

Mr. DAVILA. There were two continental Americans among the heads of departments that were appointed. And I want you to understand that we do not object to the appointment of continental Americans. We welcome Americans to Porto Rico when they come down there to cast their lot with our people, but the organic law was drafted with an idea of giving the people of Porto Rico an opportunity to share the offices, so they might gain experience in self-government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand there were only three of these appointees.

Mr. DAVILA. There were three heads of departments that failed of confirmation by the Senate.

E. Mont Reily was nominated by the President as Governor of Porto Rico and confirmed by the Senate on the 11th of May 1921, in spite of the opposition of the distinguished Senator from Iowa, Mr. Kenyon.

On May 16, when Gov. Yager was still in Porto Rico in the discharge of his official duties as executive of the island, E. Mont Reily, without extending the courtesy of waiting for Yager's departure, notwithstanding the fact that he had been requested to do so, took his oath in the city of Washington, and since that day has been receiving the amount of $10,000 a year, which is the salary assigned to the Governor of Porto Rico.

The new governor stayed in the mainland 68 days, devoting his time to the local politics of Missouri, to distribute some governmental positions in the island among his friends of Kansas City, Mo., and to indulge in political activities connected with the insular people under the pernicious influences of some politicians from Porto Rico who came to this country especially to bias and prejudice the governor against the majority in the island. It is very easy to influence Gov. Reily in the wrong way, while it is rather hard to persuade him to do the right thing. The first official act done by the governor a few days after his appointment was to request an increase in the salaries of his private secretary, his stenographer, and the chief of the secret service of Porto Rico. He appointed to the last position a friend of his from Kansas City, illiterate, who was a jailer in that city, and who had to be removed for incompetency as such.

REILY WANTED INCREASED SALARIES AND UNDIMINISHED FUNDS.

The governor urged me to wire to the Porto Rican Legislature requesting the increase of these salaries. I did that with reluctance, especially when he told me, "Increase the salaries of these offices, do not cut the appropriations of the governor, and we will get along all right." [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was the request for the increase of these salaries made before he left this country for Porto Rico?

Mr. DAVILA. It was made while he was here in Washington. In spite of the advice received by the governor in Washington from prominent members of the administration, he appointed as his private secretary a continental American who does not know the Spanish language. Mr. Reily knows no Spanish and requires as private secretary a man thoroughly familiar with both languages, Spanish and English, in order to be able to understand and to make himself understood by the people he was sent to govern.

He appointed as chief of the secret service of Porto Rico a man from Kansas City, a man whom I would like to have you see. It is a shame to have such a man as the chief of the secret service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is no doubt due to the fact that he was engaged in the pawnbroking business before he was appointed.

Mr. DAVILA. That is the information I have from Kansas City. Everybody who knows him in Kansas City knows that. I wish to say that this is the first time that a governor of Porto Rico has appointed as his private secretary a man unfamiliar with the Spanish language. All former governors have chosen secretaries who knew Spanish and English. Governor Reily is the only one who believes that he can communicate with the people of Porto Rico through a secretary who does not know the Spanish language.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Has the governor a confidential interpreter, or upon whom does he rely?

Mr. DAVILA. I do not know. He has a military aid who is a captain in the United States Army, and who knows Spanish.

Now I want you to listen to this statement which I am about to make, because it is important.

Reily while in Washington, and without knowing the people of the island, recommended the removal of the auditor, the attorney general, and the commissioner of education of Porto Rico. He admitted to me that he had recommended new candidates for these positions and that it was his intention to appoint as auditor a friend of his from Kansas City. Regarding the attorney general, who is a Porto Rican, Reily stated that he was a Wilson man, a Democrat, and a supporter of Gov. Yager. He opened the gates of his prejudice when he told me: "I will not allow you to control the affairs of Porto Rico as you did under the Wilson administration. I am the boss now," he added. "You may do as you please," I answered, "but your prejudice, before having any personal knowledge about my country, shows me that you are going to fail. Porto Rico will welcome an executive, but not a boss." [Applause.]

After a long and bitter discussion with the governor, he at last promised me to withdraw his recommendations for removals and new appointments, but I was deeply disgusted with his attitude, and I took the matter up with Gen. McIntyre, the Secretary of War, and the President, protesting against these removals, and my advice was definitely accepted. Later, the governor, after his arrival in Porto Rico, insisted on the appointment as auditor of his friend from Kansas City, and asked the resignation of Judge Bonner, a continental American of remarkable ability, who has gained the respect and admiration of the people of Porto Rico and who was first appointed by President Taft.

With the purpose of giving Gov. Reily full cooperation in spite of my disappointment, after several interviews with him, I accompanied him to Porto Rico with the intent of paving his way at the beginning of his administration. On our way down to the island a friend of mine showed me a clipping from an American newspaper containing a statement by Gov. Reily with regard to Porto Rico. When I read that clipping I was greatly surprised, because I could not understand how the governor, without knowing our people, could make statements hurting their feelings in the most vicious way. I remember that in that statement the governor said that he was going to make the English language the only language in the island; that this language must be paramount, and all others, including the Spanish, secondary. I called the governor's attention to the clipping, and he stated that he had been misquoted, but admitted that he was going to say in his inaugural address that the English language must be paramount. I told him that this was a big mistake, that the Spanish language was the language of the Porto Ricans, and the only thing that he could properly say was that both languages, English and Spanish, should be taught in the public schools on equal basis.

It is a difficult task to convince the governor and although he accepted my advice at the time his statement showed me plainly the state of his mind which has been ratified by his subsequent acts in the island. It happened that among the passengers on the boat was a Porto Rican named J. M. Hernandez, who applied to the President through the Bureau of Insular Affairs for the position of commissioner of education of Porto Rico. Mr. Hernandez requested me to introduce him to the governor. I conveyed his desire to Mr. Reily and he replied: "I do not like that man." "Do you know him?" I asked. "No," he answered, "but he filed his application at the War Department and the War Department and the Bureau of Insular Affairs have nothing to do in this matter, I am the boss." I tried to excuse Mr. Hernandez, and at last the governor decided to meet him. Mr. Hernandez was warned by me about the governor's statement.

REILY SAYS HE IS "VERY INFLUENTIAL."

In this connection I want to say that Reily boasts of his strong influence with the President of the United States. He told me that he was going to make his military aid, who is a captain in the United States Army, a colonel. "I am a very influential man," he said. "Do you know what the President told me yesterday? I told Mr. Harding that I was going to recommend to him several appointments for the island of Porto Rico. The President replied: 'Why don't you make the appointments?' 'Well, Mr. President, you are the boss,' and the President said: 'Mont, bring me the names and I will sign.' So you see, I am a very influential man and I can make the captain a colonel." [Laughter.]

The administration of E. Mont Reily as Governor of Porto Rico has been a succession of insults to the people. When he went to the island he found a land of peace and happiness, and almost overnight he transformed it into a hotbed of dissension and despair.

The inhabitants of Porto Rico are an unusually docile and friendly people by temperament. They have respect for law and order and for officials occupying executive positions. Also they respect and honor an official of their sovereign guardian, the United States, which they know as an altruistic and generous Nation and of which they are proud to be a part.

Gov. Reily could have had the everlasting friendship and affection of Porto Ricans of all classes had he possessed the least qualification to be their governor.

Beginning with the day of his arrival, insult has followed insult. We have pride in Porto Rico, gentlemen, and I say to you in full truth that we can stand no more. The moment has come when our self-respect rebels. We appeal to you for relief from this administrator. We ask you to investigate his acts. We believe that should he be a witness before a committee of Congress that he himself will be the best evidence of the justice of our demand for his removal.

I charge that E. Mont Reily, Governor of Porto Rico, removed and caused to be removed from office officials of long experience and efficiency without justification and caused to be appointed in their stead others lacking in the qualifications necessary to a proper discharge of the duties of the office to which they were appointed.

I charge that E. Mont Reily declared to members of the Porto Rican Senate, and other citizens, that he would have the Government at Washington annul the organic act, which provides that appointments shall be made with the advice and consent of the Senate, in case his nominations were not confirmed, which amounts to intimidation.

I charge that E. Mont Reily has endeavored to stir up strife and discord among the citizens and destroy the cordial relations now so happily existing among the loyal and patriotic people of Porto Rico, by false statements and by wicked and unwarranted accusations in public speeches against men of high character and patriotism who had shortly theretofore been elected by the people to places of honor and high responsibility in the government of Porto Rico.

I charge that Gov. Reily reappointed the same persons to office who had been rejected by the senate, his act being a flagrant violation of the law.

I charge that E. Mont Reily has attempted to poison the mind and prejudice the public opinion of the people of the United States by falsely stating in public speeches that prominent leaders of the people of Porto Rico were disloyal and traitors.

I charge that he has unlawfully interfered with the courts of justice and attempted to intimidate the judges thereof.

I charge that he has in public speeches attempted to bring the courts of the island and judiciary into disrepute.

I charge that he has declared in public speeches that he knew the courts of the island did not administer justice with honesty and impartiality, and called upon any citizen who had any complaint against a judge to report it to him, promising that he would remove the judge so complained of if he had to get up at midnight to do it.

I charge that he summoned the judge of one of the courts to his office and threatened him with removal because that judge had issued an injunction restraining the issuance of municipal bonds by the city of Mayaguez, which action by the court, the governor alleged, had been the cause of the defeat of his Republican friend in the municipal election which followed.

I charge that E. Mont Reily has in his public speeches in utter disregard of the feelings and sentiments of the citizens of Porto Rico denounced the flag of Porto Rico as a "dirty rag."

I further charge that he has publicly stated that the fire which broke out on the steamship Tanamo, the ship on which he returned from Porto Rico in November last, was of incendiary origin, set by his opponents in Porto Rico in an effort to get him out of the way, and that he had proof of what he stated, and that the department of justice also had such proof. In connection with this he exhibited cables purporting to bear out the truth of his statements.

The real truth of the matter is that the president of the Atlantic Fruit Co. has written me that the result of the investigation showed that the fire was caused by a cigarette dropped down one of the forward ventilators.

The following information will throw additional light on the high-handed manner of Gov. Reily:

He asked the resignation of the auditor of Porto Rico, Judge Bonner, an able and efficient man, replacing him by W. L. Kessinger, of Kansas City, Mo., who has not the experience of the former.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. In one of the charges the gentleman made he said that the Governor of Porto Rico called a judge before him who had issued an injunction. Did he remove the judge?

Mr. DAVILA. No; he did not remove the judge.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Why did he call the judge before him?

Mr. DAVILA. He threatened the judge.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I believe you charged that Gov. Reily intimidated the judge?

Mr. DAVILA. He threatened him with removal, but he did not remove him. We have evidence to prove that attempted intimidation. The injunction was issued during Gov. Yeager's administration.

CHARGES AGAINST GOV. REILY ARE SPECIFIC.

He asked the resignation of the commissioner of the interior of Porto Rico, Mr. Guillermo Esteves, a Porto Rican of great experience and unquestioned ability, replacing him with Mr. John A. Wilson, a continental American.

He caused the removal of Mr. Carey Hickle, who rendered efficient service as assistant commissioner of education, replacing him with Mrs. Liggett, of Kansas City, Mo., who has not the experience of the former.

He removed the chief of the secret service, Mr. Doby, replacing him with George S. McClure, of Kansas City, a man without any experience in detective work.

He caused the removal of the chief of the bureau of labor, Mr. Carmelo Honore, who was replaced by a Socialist recommended by the governor. The reinstatement of Mr. Honore has been ordered by the district court of San Juan in a mandamus proceeding.

He appointed Mr. W. S. Lippitt, a continental American, as head of the department of health, to replace Dr. Ruiz Soler, a native of Porto Rico.

Mr. W. L. Kessinger, jr., from Kansas City, Mo., has been appointed assistant to his father, replacing Mr. McCown, an able and efficient man.

He removed the municipal judge of Ponce without cause, and a few days later reinstated him.

He removed the municipal judge of San Juan without an investigation.

He removed the marshal of the said court in the same way, and a few days later reinstated him.

He removed the clerk of said court also without hearing and investigation.

Judge Pablo Berga, of the district court of Humacao, was summoned by the governor to his office and in the presence of the attorney general threatened with removal without any justifiable reason.

A little less than three weeks after his arrival in Porto Rico he dismissed three policemen and promptly reinstated them.

He dismissed the chief of the Ponce detective force and one of his subalterns, and 10 days later reinstated them both.

He promoted the district chief of Carolina, two days later dismissed him, and two days later reinstated him.

Judge Lopez Acosta, of the district court of Guayama, was subjected to a humiliating investigation on the strength of anonymous letters preferring charges against his conduct in office.

The judges of Patillas and Camuy were also investigated on the feeble excuse of anonymous reports.

He pardoned a policeman who had been sentenced by a lower court, which sentence was still on appeal to a higher court. This man had to be expelled a few days later by the chief for having been guilty of the crime of assault and rape.

The appointment of George S. McClure by Gov. Reily as chief of the secret service is most humiliating to the people of Porto Rico. McClure is a man of very low type, without any education or manners. McClure's fitness for the position which he now occupies can best be defined by reproducing an excerpt from a letter written by Mr. Charles Edwards, chief of police of Kansas City and McClure's former chief:

> Mr. McClure was appointed a clerk in this department on December 1, 1919, and resigned by request on May 2, 1921. His resignation was asked for during a reorganization of the department when it was found that he was an incompetent clerk. He was never suspected of having any talent for detective work.

This is one of the men for whom Gov. Reily asked an increase in salary of the Legislature of Porto Rico, stating that he was the best detective in Kansas City, Mo. He admitted that McClure did not know any Spanish, but said that he could detect in any language. [Laughter.]

One of the first achievements of McClure after his arrival in Porto Rico was to violently wrest a Porto Rican flag from an automobile, tear it to shreds, and trample it beneath his feet. He has been a constant insult to the people of Porto Rico.

DESTROYING CONFIDENCE OF PEOPLE IN JUDICIARY.

The attitude of the governor toward the judiciary is of such a nature that it deserves the most serious rebuke.

By removing judges without proper investigation, as provided by law; by announcing in public speeches that there were courts in the island that did not administer justice with honesty and impartiality; by inviting the people in open meetings to prefer charges against the judges, with the promise of dismissing them immediately, even at midnight, he has not only exceeded his authority but has weakened the efficiency of the courts.

Not only has he done irreparable damage to the peace and dignity of the island by causing the people to weaken their confidence in their respect for the courts, but he has created a feeling of uncertainty and unrest among the members of the bench, who are expecting at any time to receive the notification of removal which will expose them to the condemnation and ridicule of the people.

There is nothing that lends more honor to a country than an independent judiciary, and conversely no acts of oppression could be more harmful to a people than those which destroy the efficiency of their courts.

Chief Justice Marshall, defining the duties of a judge, with his usual remarkable ability says:

He has to pass between the most powerful individual in the community and the poorest and most unpopular. It is of the last importance that in the exercise of these duties he should observe the utmost fairness. Need I press the necessity of this? Does not every man feel that his own personal security and the security of his property depend on that fairness?

The judicial department—

Adds the able jurist—

comes home in its effects to every man's fireside; it passes on his property, his repuation, his life, his all. Is it not to the last degree important that he should be rendered perfectly and completely independent, with nothing to influence or control him but God and his conscience?

You do not allow a man to perform the duties of a juryman or of a judge if he has one dollar of interest in the matter to be decided, and will you allow a judge to give a decision when his office may depend on it? When his decision may offend a powerful and influential man?

Gov. Reily needs a lecture not only on the duties of a judge but also on the duties of an executive.

CHARACTER OF COMPANIONS DISQUALIFIES REILY.

Not the least of the practices of Gov. Reily which are deplored by loyal Porto Ricans is the character of some of his associates and counselors. His cooperation with the leader of the Socialist Party to the exclusion of prominent Porto Ricans of standing and high reputation has particularly incensed and humiliated the better element of the people.

This demagogue has prospered in Porto Rico by preaching the most radical and revolutionary doctrine. Notwithstanding the attitude of the United States Government toward the soviets of Russia, he proclaimed himself their champion and also announced his affiliation with the third internationale of Moscow. His attitude toward the soviets was announced in a public meeting held by the socialists in San Juan on May 1, 1919, and became notorious throughout Porto Rico. He further incensed every decent citizen of the island, irrespective of his faith, by his ribald attack upon the teachers of the Christian religion.

And yet in spite of these facts, which were known to all men, the governor in his tour of the island publicly embraced this man and repeatedly referred to him as the type of citizen with whom he proposed to counsel while he remained Governor of Porto Rico.

In proof of what has just been stated about the speech of this crony and counselor of the governor, the following extracts are submitted from the official record of his address at the meeting of the Socialist Party on May 1, 1919, which was printed and widely circulated:

A certain prominent young lady was imbued with the belief that all the evils suffered by humanity were due to a lack of Christian training and education. We have been able to convince her of her error and demonstrate that the wickedness which distressed her also actuated the very teachers of Christian morality whose precepts she would invoke. They alone are responsible for so many public calamities, for such widespread misfortune, for the desperation of so many families, for such widespread vice, and for the prevalence of much of the injustice which results in overthrowing the foundations of society and degrading the very principles of social morality.

* * * * * * *

I agree with the soviets' statements. They have declared through their representatives in the United States: "We have not come to this country to ask for the recognition of political representation, but only for the recognition of our right to explain the questions that affect our people."

The soviets have abolished all the old bourgeois system, they have disregarded the platform of the moderate socialists. They have followed the communist practices, which are the ones prevailing to-day in Russia.

Should we have the power of the Russian soviets we would find the means of solving the welfare of our own people, just as those brave fighters are solving theirs.

REILY'S PAST HISTORY WILL ALSO BEAR INVESTIGATION.

I am strongly of the opinion, from information that has been submitted to me, that an investigation of Reily's past history will show that he was not the kind of a man who should have been placed in an important position like that of a governor of 1,300,000 people. His past is shady, to say the least. I will not undertake to mention all the leads that have been furnished me as being possible subjects of investigation to bring out Reily's lack of qualification. I will, however, state that Reily was appointed assistant postmaster of Kansas City, Mo., in 1902. In 1904 he was investigated and recommended for removal for having made false affidavits and for having caused certain scurrilous articles to be published in the public press about prominent citizens of Kansas City. In 1906 he was investigated, and in 1909 he was recommended for removal after an investigation by a special agent, and the postmaster directed to remove him.

Here you have a man who has been removed as assistant postmaster of Kansas City, Mo., and who has been appointed governor of Porto Rico. He has no qualification to be an assistant postmaster in a city with a salary of $3,000 a year, and he has been considered qualified to be the executive of a country with a population of 1,300,000 inhabitants, which exceeds the population of 18 States of the Union and with a salary of $10,000 a year. If he was not good enough to be an assistant postmaster, how can he be qualified to be the governor of a distant possession, which requires a man skilled in the art of government, with broad and sagacious views and distinguished ability in dealing with the questions arising in public affairs?

As I have not seen the record of Reily in the Post Office Department, I am unable to give the details of the charges made against him. I have only been able to obtain from a friend of mine the communication ordering his removal. I asked for the record in the department and they told me that it was a private matter which they were not allowed to make public. I replied that as the representative of Porto Rico I was entitled to know the record of the executive of my island, but my efforts failed. Later I insisted, stating that I was going to introduce a resolution in the House asking for the record. They told me that probably I would not be able to obtain the whole thing, because they usually destroy those records after a reasonable time.

Allow me to say at this point that I can not understand how the Post Office Department can see its way clear to accept the advice of E. Mont Reily in the filling of the positions of the department in Porto Rico. If Reily himself was removed for cause and could not keep his position as assistant postmaster, how can he be considered qualified to recommend the postmasters of Porto Rico? We can not expect good service from his recommendations. How can we feel sure he will not select men even worse than himself?

I have read an affidavit signed by Donald W. Ross, a bank examiner for the State of Missouri, stating that Reily offered to promote his application for appointment as national bank examiner in consideration of $1,000. This affidavit was sent to the Secretary of War. I have read another affidavit signed by Ross repudiating his first. It has been stated that Reily obtained this second affidavit from Ross by improper means, that he did not deny asking for $1,000, but that it was for campaign purposes and not for his personal use. The stenographer who took down the second affidavit has stated that it was altered several times by Reily while she was transcribing her notes. This document, Ross states in a third affidavit, was only glanced at when he signed it. I have also seen a sworn statement from the notary who acknowledged the signature of Ross's first affidavit, and his statement contradicts Reily's attempt to show that the first Ross affidavit was obtained by unfair means.

I make no brief for a man who would sign an affidavit without looking at it, but the statements of the stenographer and notary raise the question whether or not Reily's methods in obtaining the second Ross affidavit are more reprehensible than the original charge that he offered to promote a candidacy for a Federal position for money. Since both these affidavits have been made public, it would seem that justice both to Gov. Riley and Ross warrants a full investigation into this side of the case.

REILY CONSTANTLY AFFRONTS MAJORITY PARTY.

The attitude of Gov. Reily toward the majority of the island is an affront to American ideals and the principles of democracy. A democratic government is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and autocracy is based on the idea of minority rule, and if you carry the autocracy rule to the extreme you get despotism. President Harding in his message to Congress on December 6 recognizes that ours is a popular Government through political parties, that the party in power should assume responsibility, determine upon policies in the conference which supplements conventions and election campaigns, and then strive for achievement through adherence to the accepted policy. For a century and a third, says the President, parties have been charged with responsibility and held to strict accounting. When they fail, they are relieved of authority; and the system has brought us to a national eminence no less than a world example.

These are the views of the President regarding our national policy, and I believe that if these principles are sound and good in the continental United States they will produce the same effect in all the countries under the American flag. There does not exist any good argument to make an exception of the people of Porto Rico. If the majority rules in the United States, I do not see any reason why it should not rule in Porto Rico. As human beings, as a people educated in Christian principles, we are entitled to the benefit of these democratic doctrines as well as the citizens living and born on the continent.

E. Mont Reily since his arrival in Porto Rico launched a campaign against the party in power and the most prominent leaders of this party. We carried the country by an overwhelming majority at the general elections and have the support and backing of the people of Porto Rico. Gov. Reily has declined to recognize the leaders of the majority party, has taken as his advisers men belonging to the minority, and is guided exclusively by their advice. Prominent among these is the leader of the Socialist Party, a disciple of Lenin and Trotsky, and an enemy of the Christian doctrine.

According to the peculiar ideas of E. Mont Reily all the political parties of the island ought to be in power—the Socialist, the Republican, and the Unionist. He thinks that it is possible to carry into effect at the same time the different platforms of these political organizations. He seems to be a sponsor for these ideals, but what he really wants is to destroy the majority party of the island under the futile excuse that it is his purpose to be impartial and fair to everybody.

Under the organic law of Porto Rico the executive can appoint four heads of the departments with the advice and consent of the Senate. These positions have always been filled by members of the majority party since the enactment of the new organic law. Reily asked the resignation of the commissioner of the interior, recognizing, in a letter written to the commissioner, that he was an efficient and able public servant, but that it was his desire to make the new appointments along the lines of a division between the various parties of the island, so that one party alone should not be in control of the country. He carried out his views appointing only one member of the majority party and giving to the minority three appointments. When he made the announcement of these appointments he publicly stated in the press that the commissioner of agriculture and labor and the head of the department of health were Republicans, that the commissioner of the interior was a Democrat, and the treasurer a Unionist. By this statement the governor showed that the most important point he had in mind in selecting these men was their political affiliation and not the efficiency and capacity of the appointees. He began to play politics, and he wants now to compel the senate to accept these political nominations in defiance of the majority party. As the reasons adduced by the governor to justify these appointments are political he can not complain if the senate rejects the appointments on political reasons. [Applause.]

COALITION CABINET WOULD BE A BLUNDER.

The creation by the governor of a cabinet of three parties is in my opinion a serious blunder. There is much to say about coalition cabinets. They may be justified during a period of great crisis, and even at that time it is very difficult to secure the success of the administration, for it is almost impossible to reconcile the views of men of different opinion in public matters.

We have the historic example of Lincoln's embarrassment and we know that McKinley wisely declined the appointment of a coalition Cabinet during the Spanish-American War. A Cabinet of three parties in normal times can only serve to hamper and embarrass the administration, and instead of being nonpartisan it may have the disadvantage of being too partisan. Let us have in mind, Mr. Chairman, that we are not saints but men, that we are living on earth and not in heaven and that a perfect government with a hundred per cent efficiency is something which can not be expected from the imperfect human nature and which will not naturally be expected from the people of Porto Rico. We, the Porto Ricans, like you gentlemen, are human beings with vices and virtues, with all the attributes inherent, in human nature, and the system which can not work with success in the United States or in any other part of the world can not be successful in Porto Rico. Under a democracy you have to rely on the majority, as it is impossible to secure unanimity of views and unanimous support. The President of the United States is elected by a majority of the people, so are Senators, Members of Congress, and all elective officers. The same policy prevails in the selection of the members of the Cabinet, and this policy ought to be extended to my island, unless it is considered that Porto Rico is an exception to the rule.

Apart from the crisis created in Porto Rico by the governor himself, there does not exist any condition which may serve as an excuse for the selection of a coalition cabinet. There is nothing abnormal in the island but the presence of E. Mont Reily.

It is evident that the new organic law was approved by Congress for the purpose of enabling the people of Porto Rico to have more control of their own affairs in order to train our citizens in the exercise of self-government. Gov. Reily, disregarding the spirit of our fundamental law, displaced two able Porto Ricans from the positions of commissioner of the interior and the department of health to appoint two continental Americans, thus depriving the majority party and the people of the island of two important positions. To justify this outrage to the public opinion expressed at the polls, Reily alleged that the Unionist Party favored the independence of Porto Rico and that he will not appoint to public office men who believed in the independence of their country. This is a futile excuse of the governor to justify his unthinkable attitude and to carry into effect his evil purpose. I want to cite a concrete example to show the state of mind of E. Mont Reily.

Although Reily was removed by the Post Office Department as assistant postmaster of Kansas City, he is, notwithstanding, the advisor of the department for all the appointments of postmasters in Porto Rico. Reily declined to recommend for reappointment Mr. Candelario Morales, a young man who volunteered for Army service and who is a hundred per cent American—a phrase which the governor constantly abuses—for the only reason that this man is a member of the majority. The record of this patriot is as follows:

He resigned his position as deputy clerk of the district court of Guayama, P. R., to join the first officers' training camp, and obtained a commission as second lieutenant, being promoted later to first lieutenant. He was honorably discharged December 31, 1918, when the Porto Rico Brigade was demobilized. Having resigned his position to join the colors, I gladly recommended him for the postmastership at Cabo Rojo, securing his appointment under President Wilson's administration. When the postmastership at Cabo Rojo was advanced from fourth to third class, I recommended him again to Postmaster General Hays, explaining the special circumstances of the case. In spite of the reason advanced in behalf of Mr. Morales, the President appointed a new man who was not an ex-service man, under the recommendation of Gov. Reily. Mr. Morales had an interview with the governor about this matter with the desire of obtaining his recommendation. The governor replied emphatically that he could not indorse him for the postmastership because he was a Unionist, and he could not recommend any man belonging to a party which was attacking him.

I again recommended Morales for a new postmastership, emphasizing the justice of his case, and the department says that it is necessary to consult with Reily before making the appointment. Morales is a normal-school graduate and served as a school-teacher for seven years and speaks Spanish and English fluently. He is at present a captain in the National Guard and organized a company in the city of Cabo Rojo. He is also a captain of the Reserve Corps. He has been recommended by the adjutant general of Porto Rico and by the inspector of the Post Office Department, Mr. W. R. Ryan, who is well acquainted with his activities as postmaster of Cabo Rojo.

Here you have a hundred per cent American, as the governor says, who could not get a position under the administration of Gov. Reily only because he is a member of the majority party. This concrete example shows plainly that the purpose of the governor is not to oppose the people who favor independence but to defy the public opinion of Porto Rico. This new governor, with a percentage of "Americanism" which surpasses all the patriots of America, denies a position to a man who served the Nation during the great crisis in the last war and has shown his loyalty beyond any reasonable doubt. This is the compensation that the American governor in the island reserves for the boys who served the country while he was in Kansas City playing the low politics for which he has a great devotion.

Regarding the policy of the majority party I want to state that in a convention held at San Juan, P. R., some days ago, a new platform was adopted eliminating the issue of independence and advocating full self-government under the American flag. This is the definite policy of the party. As a matter of fact, the people of Porto Rico have been always loyal to the American Nation. As Mr. Barcelo very properly stated during his recent visit to the mainland, the ideal of independence is an academic question. Gov. Reily himself, in spite of his animosity against the majority party, admits that there are not more than 200 Porto Ricans who want separation from the United States.

I really believe that the most serious mistake committed by the governor during the stormy period of his short administration has been his bitter opposition to the representatives duly elected by the people and his contemptuous attitude toward them. Aside from the several reasons we have already cited for his recall, his defiance of public opinion, his entire disregard of the majority of the people are, in my judgment, sufficient causes to justify his immediate removal. It is impossible to have a decent and good administration under such autocratic policy. If the majority of the people is not entitled to have a voice and intervention in the administration of public affairs, what are the elections for? Under our organic law the senate and legislature are elected by the people, and when the executive does not work in harmony with the legislature but pursues a policy of opposition and contempt toward the majority, he is surely doomed to fail. I feel confident that the national administration will not back him in this erroneous and Machiavellian policy. Should he be indorsed by the authorities here, it should be better to repeal at once our organic law so that we may know we have an open autocratic government instead of a despotism under the mask of a liberal régime. Between the two evils, the first is preferable.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman has detailed a most astounding state of facts, and which if found to be correct show gross unfitness of the governor of Porto Rico for that important position. I would like to ask if the gentleman feels that he can state without reservation to the membership of this House that his views are reflected by the citizens of Porto Rico?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes; I am a Representative of the people of Porto Rico. I was elected by 126,000 votes. I am a member of the majority party in Porto Rico, but I represent the people of Porto Rico. I dare say there is not a sensible citizen of the island who will support a man like Gov. Reily. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. I will.

Mr. MICHENER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that during the Wilson administration that administration followed the advice and counsel of the gentleman who is now speaking in making all appointments?

Mr. DAVILA. That was the general policy.

Mr. MICHENER. In other words, there was nothing done during Wilson's administration in Porto Rico except by the advice of the gentleman now speaking?

Mr. DAVILA. I was speaking of the appointments in the Postmaster General's Department. I was consulted by the administration. I will not say that I was consulted in everything, but in the majority of things.

Mr. MICHENER. I think the gentleman stated that in his main speech. The trouble now is that the gentleman is not consulted when the appointments of officers are carried out.

Mr. DAVILA. In the Wilson administration I was the adviser of the Post Office Department and all appointments in Porto Rico were made after consultation with me. They have denied that now.

Mr. MICHENER. And that is the principal trouble.

Mr. DAVILA. Oh, no; nothing of the kind. The main thing is that Gov. Reily is not fit to be Governor of Porto Rico. I want to make it clear that we demand a man of high honor and high ideals.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Who has more right to be consulted than the representative chosen by the majority of the voters of that island?

Mr. MURPHY. But is it wise to find fault with a man because he wants to appoint a new set of officers. I wish we had a fellow like that over here now. Perhaps he would help us get a few Republicans into jobs. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If the gentleman is anxious to get a man like that, he can possibly get this same man from Porto Rico. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURPHY. I am sure it would meet the approbation of people in Ohio who want to get into a job.

Mr. DAVILA. I want to say that I am not complaining on that ground. I want to see decent appointments made in the island, and I have not made any complaint here about my not being consulted. I said that the governor refused to appoint a man who rendered service during the war, and he refused to appoint him simply because he belonged to the majority party of Porto Rico.

The governor has not consulted with the members of the majority party in the senate about his nominations but has been very active in consulting with the members of the minority, and especially with the leader of the Socialist Party. During a session of the senate the Socialist senator announced that he had to retire because he had been called by Gov. Reily to consult with him regarding several appointments still pending. This invitation of the governor, publicly announced in the senate by the Socialist leader, is most humiliating to the members of the majority. In the opinion of Gov. Reily they do not mean anything in the island, although they have the overwhelming support of the people, and the leader of the Socialist Party, who was born in Spain, is consulted by the governor to the exclusion of these prominent Porto Ricans and duly elected representatives of the people. But Gov. Reily has gone further than that. The Senate refused to confirm the nominations of the commissioner of the interior, the head of the department of health, and the commissioner of agriculture and labor. Reily immediately after the adjournment of the senate appointed in recess the same men rejected. He has confirmed by his acts previous statements made by him showing his utter disregard of the Porto Rican Senate.

ORGANIC LAW REQUIRES ADVICE AND CONSENT OF SENATE.

According to our organic law the governor shall make these appointments with the advice and consent of the Senate of Porto Rico, and appointments made while the senate is not in session shall be effective either until disapproved or until the next adjournment of the senate for the session. The refusal of the senate to confirm the nominations had not any effect at all in the judgment of Gov. Reily, as it is shown by the immediate appointment of the same nominees rejected. In my opinion the law is very clear. If the executive can appoint the same persons rejected by the senate, then the provision in the law "with the advice and consent of the senate" is entirely useless. It can not be said that the governor is right in the construction of the law, because to arrive at this conclusion will be equivalent to declare that the fundamental law of the country may be entirely disregarded by a political trick. Under this theory the executive will be able to make all his appointments without the advice and consent of the senate, for if he can disregard the law in one case he may do it as many times as he wishes.

As Lord Durham says in his report to the British Empire dealing with the conditions prevailing in Canada in 1839—

> The governor should be instructed that he must carry on his government by heads of the departments in whom the united legislature shall repose confidence, and that he must look for no support from home in any contest with the legislature except on points involving strictly imperial interests.

E. Mont Reily, acting as a pro consul, has a very peculiar conception of government, assuming that he is the executive, the legislature, and the judiciary. He considers himself vested with extraordinary power to handle alone all the affairs of the island. This exercise of extraordinary power should be unwise and despotic in a man of high mentality, but in the case of E. Mont Reily is repulsive and intolerable. His inability, his lack of tact and diplomacy, his entire absence of good judgment and administrative capacity is recognized by every man who has the opportunity of his acquaintance and of talking to him for only a little while. If he is unfit for the job, if he is not the man to be the executive of one of our most important possessions, why insist in keeping him in Porto Rico? We must have in mind, Mr. Chairman, that Porto Rico on account of the education of the insular people and the conditions prevailing in the island, which are different from those prevailing in the United States, with a foreign language, different customs and habits, requires an executive tactful, diplomatic, honest, and with the mental qualifications of a real statesman. Our relations with the Latin-American people are very close, and the success of the United States in the policy of friendship and brotherhood with our neighbors of the Latin race will depend to a great extent on the success in Porto Rico.

As we are denied a voice in naming the men who are to administer our affairs, we must at least insist that they be selected with due regard to standards that obtain in the United States.

No sentiment is more firmly fixed in the minds of the American people than the principle that a public office is a public trust.

One of the great Presidents who hewed closely to the line in helping to establish that lofty principle ventured the hope that we would never again be remitted to the system which distributes public positions purely as rewards of partisan service. Doubts, he said, might well be entertained whether our Government could survive the strain of a continuance of this system.

The spoils system, as it is working in Porto Rico, is a justification of his fears. We would not be plagued with the unhappy condition prevailing in that island to-day if the high office of governor had been tendered to a man whose past record proved him worthy of the trust instead of a place man, ineligible for appointment in his own community because of the indelible blot upon his escutcheon, placed there by the Post Office Department when he was removed for cause.

Let me finish my remarks stating that we are merely asking for an investigation of the facts; that, besides the formal charges that I have preferred before Congress, the public press has given considerable space to the conditions prevailing in Porto Rico since the arrival of the new governor, and that every day the leading papers of the country are writing editorials criticizing Gov. Reily and asking for an investigation of the charges. So this matter has become one of national interest. Under these circumstances, to be fair to the governor and to the people of the island, an investigation should be ordered. Either Reily or the people are responsible for the abnormality of the situation. If the governor is innocent, he is entitled to a public exoneration; and if we are right in our complaints, we are entitled to his immediate removal. The good name of the United States demands an investigation. Let the blame rest where it is merited.

LETTER TO PRESIDENT HARDING PROTESTING REILY'S CONDUCT.

I wish to insert in the RECORD the following letter which I sent to President Harding on December 23, 1921, and which is self-explanatory:

DECEMBER 23, 1921.

Hon. WARREN G. HARDING,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have read with the greatest interest the letter you wrote to Senator King, which was published in the press, relative to a resolution introduced by the Senator.

In order that no misconception may arise as to our attitude, and with the desire of bringing to your attention certain information which might prove of interest to you, I would like to state that we have made no objection against Americans who are occupying public office in Porto Rico, for the only reason that these gentlemen were born outside of Porto Rico. Our protest is based on far more solid and just grounds than this. Men of parts who go to Porto Rico from the North, to sincerely cooperate with us in solving our problems, deserve our love and gratitude. We can not, however, agree to the substitution of competent native Porto Ricans by Americans when the former have proven their efficiency and ability in the discharge of their duties, as in the cases of the commissioner of the interior and the chief of the health department, who were removed by Gov. Reily in order that he might appoint two Americans and by so doing take these posts from the people of Porto Rico and from the party of the majority.

Nor do we agree to the bringing to Porto Rico of Americans who are unfit for the discharge of the duties of high public office and who do not possess either the ability or the experience which such office requires.

We do not believe that Gov. Reily acted wisely when he appointed, against the advice he received while in Washington and before he had ever seen our island, as his private secretary an American who did not know our language. Mr. Reily knows no Spanish and requires as private secretary a man thoroughly familiar with both languages, Spanish and English, in order to be able to understand and to make himself understood by the people he was sent to govern.

We realize that the appointment of a private secretary is a purely personal matter, but we venture to assume that in a case such as this the governor might have been able to find a man who combined the confidence of the governor with the knowledge of the Spanish language.

We felt humiliated by the appointment of the chief of the secret service, G. S. McClure, of Kansas City, a person who was discharged from his former position for incompetency and illiteracy. The chief of the secret service should necessarily be familiar with the Spanish language and McClure knows no Spanish.

We also feel that Mr. Reily made a grievous mistake when he requested the resignation of Judge Bonner, a continental American, who had been appointed by President Taft and whose term of office had not expired, from his position as auditor of Porto Rico, and when he recommended to you for appointment to this position a friend of his from Kansas City who has not Judge Bonner's ability and experience. This is the first time that an appointee of the President has been removed without cause. Judge Bonner is an able and honest man, who has always shown absolute impartiality and whose work has earned for him the respect and admiration of the island.

In my opinion, Mr. President, the auditor of Porto Rico should not be appointed at the recommendation of the governor, as he should feel unhampered when called upon to decide matters directly affecting the acts of the governor.

Nor can we approve the appointment of the assistant auditor. He is the son of the auditor and an inexperienced youth, who should not have displaced the former assistant auditor, Mr. McCown, an American, who had filled this position with marked ability during a period covering many years.

Nor can the appointment of Mrs. Liggett, of Kansas City, to the position of assistant commissioner of education receive our sanction, for she knows no Spanish, and in order to make room for her in that position another American, Mr. Carey Hickle, was removed. Mr. Hickle had begun in the department as a teacher and had risen to his position after many years of good work.

There are many American teachers in Porto Rico, and this is a source of great satisfaction to the people, because of their desire to learn English. Our legislature makes liberal appropriations every year to this end, the largest appropriation of all having been made in the last session.

In my desire to please Gov. Reily and before his departure for Porto Rico, I acceded, although with reluctance, to his wish that the salaries of his chief of secret service, of his private secretary, and of his stenographer be increased, and I therefore cabled this request to the legislature, which was then in session, and which granted the increase.

This was Mr. Reily's first official act as Governor of Porto Rico.

At that time I did not know the kind of people he was taking with him to the island, and I could not even surmise that he intended to take as chief of secret service a man of McClure's caliber. I acceded to the desire of the governor very much against my own wishes, his request creating in me a highly unpleasant impression, which was further increased when he said: "Increase the salaries of these offices, do not cut the appropriations of the governor, and we will get along all right." I immediately recounted the occurrence to Judge TOWNER, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, and to Gen. McIntyre, and told them of my feelings.

The facts as stated in your letter to Senator KING are entirely correct. With the ratio of appointments as between continental Americans and Porto Ricans, we have not complained, although it has been the obvious aim of the administrations and the intention of Congress that citizens of the island should be selected for the public service whenever possible. What we do object to, Mr. President, has been the lack of qualifications of the appointees.

My only reason in venturing to write you is that I wished to set you right as to certain details and at the same time make clear our position.

Very respectfully, yours,

FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA,
Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico to the United States.

REPORT ADOPTED BY PORTO RICAN SENATE.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to submit the following:

Report adopted by the Senate of Porto Rico refusing to confirm nominations submitted by the governor.

SENATE OF PORTO RICO,
COMMITTEE ON NOMINATIONS,
San Juan, P. R., February 15, 1922.

To the Senate:

Your committee on nominations, to which were referred the nominations of Messrs. John A. Wilson, W. F. Lippitt, and Carlos Toro for the offices of commissioner of the interior, commissioner of health, and commissioner of agriculture and labor, respectively, for a term of four years, hereby recommends that said nominations be not confirmed, and that they be rejected for the following causes and reasons:

The organic act in force was granted to Porto Rico on March 2, 1917, as official acknowledgment of our capacity for the high functions of self-government and as an experiment for future greater political liberties. Such acknowledgment of native capacity was not the work of a moment nor the thoughtless work of a day. It was made after mature study and deliberation covering many years. It was the constant demand of three lustres, finally culminating in an act of justice which in honoring us also honored the illustrious men who at that time made up the Congress of the United States.

As a modern organic act and as an organic act almost wholly following the fundamental principles of American political law, the letter as well as the spirit of the Jones Act consecrated in Porto Rico a form of government based on and carried out by means of political parties. By such means Congress established in our island the sole bases of government accepted by democracy.

The Jones Act loudly proclaimed this principle when it gave legal life to a legislature such as ours, composed of two houses and elected by direct vote of the people. In accordance with this principle and closely connected with it, our election law later provided for the selection by public opinion of representatives in the legislature. And public opinion, which as life, is fickle, agitated, uneasy, and movable, having been asked to give faith of such life, gathered around ideals and political, economical, and social formulas, thus forming the factions of thought known as parties. These factions must gather periodically, as happens in the United States of America and in all such countries as develop under democratic standards, and at general assemblies or conventions held by them they choose such men, such candidates as the election law directs the executive to consider valid and as the executive must recognize as valid because he has beforehand recognized and respected the basic fundamental principle of government by political parties. These political parties, as the agents of public opinion and as directly responsible for their acts to the public conscience, go to the polls as surety that victory means the enactment of all such measures as the public weal demands. Such is self-government, and such is the only form of government recognized by our organic act—that is, a government based on public opinion; a government wherein the heads of departments have the confidence of the legislature.

This is proclaimed by the letter as well as the spirit of the Jones Act.

Besides the foregoing reasons we must bear in mind that section 13 of the original bill introduced in the House of Representatives by the distinguished Congressman Jones on January 10, 1916, contained the following provision:

"The heads of departments appointed by the governor may be selected from the elected members of the senate and house of representatives. * * *"

These words clearly suggest that the author of our organic act wanted to see at the head of our executive departments men who enjoyed the confidence of the legislature, and through the legislature the confidence of public opinion. It will be argued that said provision was stricken out of the bill, but to this argument we can answer that the spirit of said provision was not eliminated, but that, on the contrary, it remained latent in the bill when it became law. Example: In the report of the hearing held January 15, 1916, by the Committee on Insular Affairs the following statements appear:

"Mr. GARRET. Let me call attention to this: There is not anything in this bill that will prevent either the senate or the house—or whatever it may be called there—of Porto Rico giving to these heads of departments seats upon the floor with the right to debate. That is, if they—the Porto Rican legislators—desired to do so. They could adopt rules for their own government, and they could undoubtedly admit these gentlemen, if they saw fit to do so, to seats on the floor. There is nothing in the bill to prevent it. I would prefer to leave it to the legislature there to admit them to seats if they want to rather than put it into the organic law.

"Mr. TOWNER. A further advantage of that would be that if they found that it did not work well they could abandon it. If we put it in the fundamental law it would take an act of Congress to undo it.

"Mr. GARRET. For that reason I would prefer not to put the amendment into the organic law.

"The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Jones). Mr. Rivera, the Governor of Porto Rico is authorized under this bill to appoint four of these heads—four of the six. It is likely, is it not, that most of them, if not all of them, will be Porto Ricans and that they will be members of one branch or the other of the legislature?

"Mr. RIVERA. Yes, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. If that be so you will have four of them in the legislature anyhow."

Knowing the minds of the legislators who contributed most in the House of Representatives of the United States toward the final form of our organic act it is sufficient to quote one paragraph of the report submitted by Senator Shafroth, chairman of the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, on June 30, 1916, in referring to the proviso of section 56 of our organic act, fully to show the spirit of the National Senate when it passed our present constitution.

Said paragraph reads:

"The above amendment is recommended by your committee in order that full effect may be given to the section which provides that appointments by the governor shall, before becoming permanently effective, be confirmed by the Senate of Porto Rico. It is believed that adoption of this amendment will be evidence of good faith in the method prescribed for these appointments."

Let us now see what said proviso says:

"Provided, however, That all appointments made by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the executive council as thus constituted, in the executive council as authorized by section 13 of this act or in the office of executive secretary of Porto Rico, shall be regarded as temporary and shall expire not later than 20 days from and after the assembly and organization of the legislature hereinbefore provided, unless said appointments shall be ratified and made permanent by the said Senate of Porto Rico."

There is not the least doubt that in prescribing that the appointments referred to shall be made by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, the organic act demands, requires, and presupposes certain cooperation and harmony and a relative and mutual solidarity of action between the executive and the upper house of the legislature. This is democratic and responds to the wishes of Congress and to the true republican principles of all such governments as aspire to be termed free. But the Governor of Porto Rico, far from seeking or desiring said relative solidarity of action with the senate, far from consulting the wishes of the senate or their points of view, ignores said body and its constitutional rights and sticks to the policy originally outlined by him of governing by himself, heedless of the voice of the country and of the country's legitimate representatives. If we are to be faithful to our American citizenship, and if we are to fulfill our duty as the agents of public dignity, we must reject this attitude of supreme arbiter. The letter addressed by Gov. Reily on August 16, 1921, to the president of the senate, in which he determined his powers as governor of this island, in a letter which the Senate of Porto Rico can not pass up inadvertently, though it be only to censure and condemn it as an unjustified and officious attempt against the respect due to us.

Firm in his purpose of ignoring this senate, the governor has submitted to us for approval the names of three persons to fill the offices above mentioned, who have neither the confidence nor the support of the majority in the legislature. The policy announced by the governor on his different excursions of propaganda over the island is now clearly and fully revealed. The executive not only does not count on the senate in making his appointments but apparently takes special pains to designate for such important offices as the three above referred to persons from whom we have no assurance that they will second the policy of the legislature as indicated in the laws enacted by it. It might be said that the three designations were made purposely precisely because the persons appointed do not think nor feel with the majority. Such state of things must lead us into chaos and to insecurity in the management of public affairs. We must exhaust our energy in securing respect in our island for the democratic principle of a government based on the consent of the governed.

The executive continues in an exaggerated and abnormal attitude of exaltation, though his stand is unsupported by law or by any sound doctrine of government. By not seconding his antidemocratic policy the senate should leave the governor in the isolation which he imposed on himself.

The nominations in question have not come to the senate naturally and spontaneously, but in the midst of a situation purposely provoked by the executive.

The haste of the government in creating vacancies was the result of nothing but the personal desire of Gov. Reily, on a hundred occasions boastfully evidenced, of carrying out his own personal policy, as against the legitimate representatives of public opinion who compose the majority of the legislature. Vacancies were violently created, without heeding acquired rights and the high moral rights of this senate, which had confirmed the appointments. The nominations now submitted to us for consideration do not, therefore, come to us naturally, since the recess appointments were artificially provoked by the executive.

Recesses are real things, and in a sound concept of justice the power of appointment during recess should not be extended by provoking artful, false, and strained situations. By resorting to such methods there is no doubt that the senate's unquestionable right to be consulted and to intervene in appointments would be annulled and reduced to nothing, while the powers of the governor would increase almost to omnipotence. Such is the policy of Gov. Reily and such is the mission he claims to have come here to carry on—to increase his powers at the expense of the senate, to multiply them to the detriment of ours; to create a personal government, not a government of law; an autocratic government, instead of an American democratic government, as required by national traditions and as desired by Congress in granting us the Jones Act.

Why does Mr. Reily wish so much power? Why such centralization of power? Facts will tell later on what it is he seeks, although it is enough for this senate now to record the fact that Gov. Reily violates our fundamental laws when he acts as he does.

In the cases of Messrs. Ruiz Soler, Esteves, and Camuñas the executive acted hastily. These upright and splendid public servants, who are loyal to the national administration and institutions, deserved better treatment at the hands of the executive. Instead of causing vacancies in their offices during recess the executive should have awaited the session of the senate. There was a period but of a few weeks between the expiration of their terms and the session of the senate.

Nominations such as these, submitted in a spirit of hostile challenge, should not merit our consideration or approval. The governor provoked the present situation. He alone should answer for the same. The senate would have grave responsibility if it gave solidarity to the present state of affairs, and the senate must always bear in mind that it owes itself to public opinion.

HOW THE COSMOPOLITAN PRESS REGARDS REILY.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before concluding my remarks, I desire to read into the RECORD one news dispatch and four editorials from leading newspapers and periodicals. Scores of such editorials have appeared in the public press within the last few weeks calling upon President Harding to remove E. Mont Reily as governor of Porto Rico.

Commenting editorially on conditions in Porto Rico, the New York World on February 21, 1922, under the caption, "A politician out of place," said:

E. Mont Reily went to Porto Rico as governor, not because he was interested in Porto Rico or in government in outlying dependencies or in the climate of the West Indies, but because he was one of the Republican politicians who led the van in the victorious campaign of 1920 and some job had to be found for him. Having reached his destination and assumed the burdens of state, he discovered that Porto Rico was not nearly so much like the Middle West as he could have wished, and he set out to remedy this defect at once.

When Mr. Reily made his hurried visit to report progress to the President last November he spent much of his time dodging delegations of Porto Ricans who had uncomplimentary things to say about his administration. A commission of islanders followed him to Washington to lay their case before Mr. Harding, but though it was apparent to everybody else that Reily's usefulness was at an end the President turned away the commission, listened instead to his trusted lieutenant and sent him back to try again. He has tried, with the result that the one party which had stuck to his cause has deserted him, his appointments are held up, and the lack of harmony has left the government in chaos. The Porto Rican commissioner is preparing to take the charges against Gov. Reily to Congress over President Harding's head, and Congress can hardly escape looking into them.

The charges are serious enough, including the removal of officials without due process, but in the main the resentment against Mr. Reily is based on his provincial intolerance of everything unfamiliar to residents of Missouri. Spanish is not spoken along the Mississippi Valley; why should it be taught in Porto Rico? Old Glory is good enough for the Middle West, therefore why should Porto Ricans be allowed to talk about independence? The people of Porto Rico has replied, very sensibly, by asking why E. Mont Reily was sent to govern them.

The Independent, published in New York, in its issue of February 11, 1922, under the caption "Act at once, Mr. Harding," said:

President Harding has been imposed upon, and the result is an appointment to office that is indefensible on any grounds. We refer to the appointment of one E. Mont Reily, of Kansas City, to be Governor of Porto Rico. Were the appointment to an office within our own country it would be bad enough in all conscience, but we could bear with it; as an answer to the responsibilities America has assumed in this island dependency it is unthinkable.

The record of Reily is such that his name should never have been considered. At one time assistant postmaster of Kansas City, he was several times investigated and recommended for removal, and finally dismissed for cause. Immediately upon receiving the present appointment, for which he was in every way unfitted, he proceeded to remove able officials, even before reaching his post, to make places for his equally incompetent associates. In this connection ugly stories are afloat, to the effect that venal considerations entered into these appointments; in other words, a commission on their salaries; and color is given to these charges by the affidavit of a reputable man in Kansas City as to such overtures being made to him.

In the six months he has been in Porto Rico he has succeeded in disrupting the civil service and intimidating the courts. His conduct has been that of a cheap politician combined with an oriental satrap. The prestige of America in the island has suffered sadly and the seed has been sown for infinite trouble.

We admire in President Harding the quality of loyalty to those in whom he has once placed confidence, and we should not esteem him so highly as we do were he to listen to idle gossip concerning his appointees. But here is a case where he has been shamefully imposed upon, and the honor of America demands that he act promptly. Reily should be suspended at once, pending investigation. In a few days the senate of Porto Rico will meet, and its first act will be to reject the governor's appointments, which are an offense to the decent people of the island. Then investigation will come perforce. Now is the time to act if a noisome scandal is to be averted.

"The Porto Rican discord" was the subject of a leading editorial in the New York Times on February 21, 1922, which follows:

It is no secret that the nomination of E. Mont Reily, of Kansas City, to be governor of Porto Rico was a "personal" appointment, Mr. Reily having been an "original Harding man." Mr. Wilson's appointee, Arthur Yater, was governor for nearly eight years without wearing out his welcome. He was competent and tactful. The Porto Ricans saw him go with regret. Gov. Reily made himself disliked in a few months. Early in August he delivered his inaugural address, and in November a commission of seven representatives of the majority Unionist Party arrived in Washington to ask President Harding to recall Gov. Reily. They saw Secretary Weeks, they had a talk with the President, but made no specific charges at that time. It is said in Washington that they refrained because they were encouraged to believe that there would be a satisfactory solution of the case. In a letter from Resident Commissioner DAVILA to Secretary Weeks he wrote:

"We have reached the conclusion that the best interests of Porto Rico and the United States would be served by refraining from formally presenting such charges at this time and by leaving the matter in the hands of the administration."

President Harding decided to support Gov. Reily and instructed him to return to his post.

When the Porto Ricans were in Washington last December they declared that if the President did not recall Gov. Reily they would ask Congress to investigate their charges. That is now their purpose. Speaking for them, Commissioner DAVILA says:

"The return of Gov. Reily to Porto Rico, apparently with the backing of the administration, and the policy that he has been following in the island since his return, have convinced us that we have exhausted our efforts to persuade the administration to remove him quietly."

It is evident that Governor Reily can not make his peace with the Unionist Party. It doesn't like his appointments. The insular senate refuses to confirm them. Under the recess rule the governor can put his men in office, but the opposition party says that disorganization of the departments will result. Politically, the new governor can not get on with the Porto Ricans. This alone might not be to his discredit, but it seems that his personal relations with them are the reverse of harmonious. They don't like his methods, they are offended by the language he uses in public, and they say that he is lacking in the dignity, consideration, and suavity they expect of an American governor.

The commission that visited Washington having failed to convince the President, an attempt is now making to show that Mr. Reily is personally unfit. Charges affecting his integrity have been made, but the affidavits obtained conflict, and Mr. Reily should have the benefit of any doubt. More serious is the recommendation of a post-office inspector, when Mr. Reily was assistant postmaster at Kansas City, that he be removed for "causing certain libelous and scurrilous articles to be published against prominent citizens of Kansas City and for making false affidavits with reference to them" (Post Office case 46702–C). If Commissioner DAVILA can prove that as a sequel to this report Assistant Postmaster Reily was removed from office in 1909, it will have been shown, to put it mildly, that a much better selection for Governor of Porto Rico could have been made by the President.

The St. Louis (Mo.) Star, in an editorial in its issue of February 19, 1922, under the caption "An administration thorn," said:

The clean bill of health that President Harding is alleged to have given to his wife's cousin's husband, E. Mont Reily, Governor of Porto Rico, on the latter's recent beclouded visit to the United States, apparently will not remain clean. The damned spot will not out. The island will have naught of the Kansas City politician and his retinue of Jackson County precinct workers, and the opposition to him, instead of subsiding, is increasing in intensity.

This week the Porto Rican Senate utterly refused to ratify any of the appointments made by Reily, and next week FELIX DAVILA, commissioner from the island to the United States, will appear in Congress to tell just why the governor is persona non grata on the island. In addition Congressman HUMPHREYS of Mississippi is preparing a resolution demanding an investigation by the House into Reily's conduct in office.

Regardless of the Kansas Cityan's merits or demerits it would appear that his usefulness in Porto Rico is at an end. He may be more unfortunate than incompetent, but with the present feeling in the island the United States can not afford to condone even ill-luck. It is becoming quite obvious that the majority of the natives have no use for the present governor, and Mr. Harding would be well advised to remove him before the feeling against Reily grows more bitter. A country that is the apostle of self-determination can not afford to send a ruler to a dependency who is not acceptable to the residents unless we are attempting to erect a Dublin Castle at San Juan.

The New York Times, on February 20, 1922, published this special dispatch from St. Louis, Mo.:

SAYS REILY MADE CHANGES—STENOGRAPHER PUT AFFIDAVIT BEFORE ROSS WITHOUT TELLING HIM.

[Special to the New York Times.]

ST. LOUIS, February 19.

The circumstances under which Donald W. Ross, of Kansas City, State bank examiner, made an affidavit January 14, repudiating a previous affidavit given to a member of the Porto Rican Commission, in which he said that E. Mont Reily had mentioned a money consideration in the event that Ross was appointed national-bank examiner, were told to-night by Miss Ida Kaufman, 1495 Arlington Avenue, a stenographer, to whom the second affidavit was dictated.

The first affidavit was written by Ross on December 10, following a meeting at the Planters Hotel with Walter Jones, of the Porto Rican Commission, which is investigating the conduct of Reily, and C. F. Keene, a Washington lawyer and former post-office inspector. They had been at Kansas City investigating Reily's official and political activities.

Miss Kaufman, who is a stenographer for the State finance commissioner, O. B. Hughes, at the Night and Day Bank, which was recently closed, said that Reily came to the bank, January 15, where Ross was employed, to see him about making an affidavit.

"I was called into the office where Mr. Ross and Gov. Reily were, and Mr. Ross started to dictate the affidavit," she said. "Gov. Reily kept interrupting with suggestions until my notes were in a muddle.

"Notes were put down and then scratched out until the whole thing was confusing. Finally the affidavit was dictated and I went to my desk to typewrite it, and Mr. Ross went about his work. Many were waiting for him to inquire about the bank's affairs.

"Gov. Reily came out to my desk and suggested a number of alterations in the affidavit. When it was written I took it in and put it on Mr. Ross's desk. I did not tell him that Gov. Reily had made any changes in the affidavit as dictated. I naturally supposed that the two had had an understanding about it.

"I did not see Mr. Ross nor talk with him about any changes in the affidavit. I suppose he thought it was just like it was when dictated."

Miss Kaufman could not point out specifically from recollection, when a copy of the affidavit was read to her over the telephone to-night, any of the changes made by Reily, except one. She said the following, which concluded Ross's affidavit, was dictated by Reily:

"I have known Gov. Reily for 15 years and have known him as a man of the highest character and integrity and have never heard anyone speak of him otherwise in his dealings."

Gov. Hyde, when called by telephone at Jefferson City to-night, said that when at Washington he called at Secretary Weeks's office to see him socially and Weeks brought up the subject of the Ross affidavits. He said that Weeks asked him about Ross and he told Weeks that he was a young man of excellent reputation, so far as he was aware.

Gov. Hyde said that Weeks told him that he had copies of Ross's first affidavit, given to Jones and Keene on December 10, and a copy of the third statement, made by Ross concerning the two previous affidavits, but that he was unable to find the second affidavit made by Ross at Reily's request, repudiating the first affidavit given to Keene and Jones. Gov. Hyde added that Weeks told him he had written to Reily to inquire about the missing affidavit.

[By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. DAVILA to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I met Mont Reily once. I hold no brief for him. I do not know him personally except as I met him once, as I say. I have known the Representative from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA] since coming to Washington. I met the president of the Porto Rican Senate. A man from my own State, whose integrity has never been questioned, who is of the highest type of manhood, was appointed United States district attorney for Porto Rico. I had heard this talk about Mont Reily. I arranged a meeting between the president of the Porto Rican Senate, the Delegate from Porto Rico, who has just taken his seat, and this United States district attorney before his going to the island. I have corresponded with the United States district attorney in Porto Rico since his arrival there. I want to say to you folks now that there are two sides to this question. It will be noticed that the Delegate from Porto Rico, who has just left the floor, dwelt long and importantly on the auditor of the public funds of Porto Rico. That is an important officer. I am convinced from correspondence that I have had with a man whose integrity I know to be unimpeachable that it was important that President Harding have an honest, fair, and square man to audit the accounts of Porto Rico. I think it only fair to this country and to Mont Reily or any other man, I think it only fair to President Harding, to have the Congress know that one of the first official acts of Mont Reily as governor of Porto Rico was to veto or nullify an illegal act or budget passed by the Legislature of Porto Rico by which the distinguished gentleman, the Delegate from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA], who has just left this floor, was to take from the treasury of Porto Rico $5,000 per year for four years, or a total of $20,000.

It is all right, Mr. Chairman. This is not my fight. The Governor of Porto Rico tells me that he had the congratulations of the distinguished gentleman who just left this floor, after going over his policies in full, but that immediately after he vetoed or acted on the act of the Porto Rican Legislature proposing to add to this gentleman's salary $20,000, or $5,000 a year for four years, this feeling arose and this denunciation began. It is not my fight. If it is not true, it should be denied; if it is true, it should be known. President Harding's administration should not be condemned for stopping that plan. [Applause.] If it was the distinguished gentleman's hand that was in the treasury of Porto Rico, then that hand should come out, the same as any other man's hand that goes into the Public Treasury that does not belong there. I have no feeling against the gentleman. I have had the kindliest personal feeling for the Delegate from Porto Rico, but this is a matter on which there is a record. Did Mont Reily veto a budget or bill appropriating $20,000 out of the treasury of Porto Rico to pay the representative here, in addition to his regular salary? Is a bill or budget of that kind legal under the laws of Porto Rico? I notice it is one thing that was not complained of in the speech of the gentleman, and it is said to be the thing that caused the trouble and caused the falling out.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Certainly.

Mr. DAVILA. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that what the gentleman has stated is true, and I will plainly show that it is entirely untrue, that his information is erroneous, I submit that the conduct of Gov. Reily in Porto Rico should be subjected to investigation.

Mr. TINCHER. Oh, I do not object to an investigation. I hope we have an investigation. President Harding should court an investigation, as should Gov. Reily, and the gentleman should court it, but I do not think it is fair to a man in Porto Rico, I do not think it is fair to the President, to have one side only of this proposition put before the American Congress.

Mr. NOLAN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that Mont Reily on his return to Porto Rico received a tremendous reception at the hands of the common people there at 1 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. TINCHER. Mont Reily says, and other Americans in Porto Rico say, that he represents 90 per cent of the better element of Porto Rico in the clean-up that he is conducting in the island. I do not vouch for the truth of that. Let us have an investigation, if one is needed. I would not mind a trip to Porto Rico myself. [Laughter.]

Talk about the flag! Talk about some detective arresting some one for throwing the flag down! Mont Reily has been charged with hoisting the American flag over the schools of Porto Rico, over the protests of the people that the gentleman from Porto Rico says he removed from office, and I have that information over the signature of a man whose integrity I know is unimpeachable.

I do not believe that any man would charge anyone whom President Harding has appointed to office with being tainted with bolshevism. This is not my fight, but I think if we are going to have an investigation we better have a good groundwork for it, and have a good one. I thank the committee, and yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is it not possible for me to get a few minutes on this matter? This is a personal matter, a personal attack, and the gentleman has impeached my character.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Now, Mr. Chairman, instead of confining myself to the manuscript as I had expected to do, owing to the lack of time, I am going to say about what I had in mind, and I have gotten the privilege of inserting what I have written in the RECORD. This is because there are so many things I desire to say that I shall not have time to say them.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman only asked the privilege of extending his remarks, but did not ask the privilege of revising his remarks, and I understand he does not want the reporter to take down anything he says, but to put his speech in the RECORD. Of course that is satisfactory to me for him to do that, but I think he had better get the consent of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may be allowed to revise and extend his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have the privilege of revising and extending his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I am willing to extend any courtesy to a Member of the House, but is not this a very unusual request to make a speech and not have it reported at all?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, within two days we will reach the end of the first year of the administration of Warren G. Harding. The country, without regard to political affiliations, will willingly accept a candid survey of the year's work. A proper appraisement must depend upon a clear understanding of the problems inherited in order to properly judge the results of the year.

These problems were many, complicated, and quite acute. They were both foreign and domestic, the direct result of the greatest convulsion known to history. This war left the world poorer in the loss of nearly 30,000,000 of her most productive people, either dead or hopelessly crippled from the standpoint of productive ability. It bequeathed a burden of debt amounting to something like $400,000,000,000. Specifically, it left France with a debt variously estimated to be within 60 to 100 per cent of her total wealth. The debt of some of the European countries like Poland is thought to be greater than her total wealth. The enormity of this phase of the problem is that not over two countries in Europe are now living within their income. That means that all others are steadily increasing their debts, with small promise of successful efforts, if any are put forth, to balance their budgets. The following figures are significant:

Europe's public debt in 1919 and at the present time.

Countries.	Total wealth.	Gross debt, 1919.	Per cent.
United States	$250,000,000,000	$25,000,000,000	10
Great Britain	90,000,000,000	40,000,000,000	44.4
France	65,000,000,000	30,000,000,000	46.1
Italy	30,000,000,000	12,000,000,000	40
Germany	85,000,000,000	40,000,000,000	47

Most recent statement.

FRANCE.

Nov. 15, 1921:	Francs.
Internal debt	241,219,064,000
External debt	85,555,000,000
Total debt	326,774,064,000

At present rate of exchange.

From statement made in French Chamber of Deputies.

This enormous debt translated into our money at par would amount to $65,000,000,000 or 100 per cent of the total wealth of France.

BRITAIN.

Feb. 1, 1922:	Pounds.
Total debt	7,585,409,690
Floating debt	1,408,000,000

ITALY.

November, 1921:	Lira.
Total debt	106,621,000,000
Internal debt	84,000,000,000
External debt	22,000,000,000

Above figures for total debt and foreign debt calculated at par. With the present rate of exchange the total debt would amount to 184,000,000,000 lira.

GERMANY.

End of year 1921:	Paper marks.
Total debt	330,000,000,000
Of this amount:
Funded debt	90,000,000,000
Floating debt	240,000,000,000

The total amount of reparations is about 132,000,000,000 gold marks. German Government is figuring 1 gold mark to 45 paper marks.

BELGIUM.

Jan. 1, 1922:	Belgian francs.
Total debt	34,702,000,000

The above figures show the failure of most countries to live within their incomes and the enormous increase of their public debt.

In contrast it is well to study our program of economy and the progress made by the administration.

The hopeless derangement of European fiscal agencies, the total demoralization of their currencies, whose purchasing power is now in many countries at the minimum, make our rate of foreign exchange almost prohibitive, and therefore seriously interferes with such foreign trade as is now available between Europe and America.

After the Civil War it took this Nation from 1865 to 1879 to resume specie payment; or, in other words, to bring our currency up to a sound basis where every dollar, no matter what its form or where its use, would buy 100 cents' worth of goods in the world's markets.

THE PRESIDENT ALIVE TO THE SITUATION.

With the almost complete breakdown of Europe's currencies, due to the fatal policy of attempting to create values by Government fiat through running the printing presses, there is no one who can tell when or how Europe will reach her former sound basis of production. Although we are distantly separated from Europe, her condition is reflected upon our own country. Our domestic problem, however serious, must be viewed more or less in the light of our foreign relations, both diplomatic and economic.

With these problems in mind the President set forth his purposes in his inaugural address which was widely acceptable by all our people without regard to politics or creed. His first official act in naming his cabinet was with these problems and their solutions in mind. It is fair to say that the year has demonstrated the hopes of the country openly expressed upon the first announcement of the Cabinet. Without disparaging comparisons the judgment of the country commends the President upon his success in surrounding himself with counsellors of the "wisest minds" such as was expected by all that portion of the population who had known him. This Cabinet ranks well with the strongest of its predecessors. It will be no offense to any open-minded citizen to state here the generally accepted fact that the administration of the diplomatic relations by the present head of the State Dpartment is the most outstanding success in our history.

OUR CONFUSED FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The war inevitably left a series of complications in our foreign relations, aggravated by the fact that we did not ratify the Versailles treaty. To adjust these acute differences growing out of the mandatory provisions of the treaty, difference for example with England over the Mesopotamian mandate, and with Japan over Yap Island, etc., demanded a high grade of ability if both honor and good will were to be conserved. One after another of the foreign complications have been cleared up. The dispute with Britain was amicably and honorably settled. That between Panama and Costa Rica was adjusted upon the basis of our contention. That of Colombia was also adjusted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I regret I can not yield.

Our relation with Mexico is better than it has been since the death of former President Diaz. The complete settlement awaits the assent of Obregon to our contention for the recognition of American property rights established upon the invitation and solicitation of Mexican official authority. There is no misunderstanding between our country and Russia, since it has been made perfectly clear that until a government is established that will respect the sanctity of a contract our Government is not in position to enter into any international agreement. As in Mexico the Government opened the door for adjustment if the countries wish to enter upon the conditions named.

Mr. Chairman, up to date every serious dispute to disturb our diplomatic relations is either adjusted, or the plan has been submitted upon which adjustment can be reached. It has all been done noiselessly yet firmly, and with honor to ourselves and complete justice to other nations. Until recently the only cloud on our international horizon was our inability to reach a complete agreement with Japan. While the objective was Yap Island, yet the problem went very much further. That was but an incident in the larger sphere. I need not restate here what has been so often stated before, that our relation with the Orient involved vast possibilities. Our abiding friendship for China, which is quite historic, induced much concern about her future as a sovereign nation unhindered by outside interference. Our historic relation with Russia, dating back to the time of our Civil War, compels us to look with deep concern over maintaining the friendship by assuring that people of our great desire to see that promising country succeed in establishing a stable and effective government, and that no country will take advantage of her in her unhappy state to secure any special rights or privileges. Our friendly sympathy with Japan in her laudable ambition to expand, in case it is not done at the sacrifice of other sovereignties, such as China and Russia, together with a more or less sensitiveness growing out of State restrictions, such as those in California, together with the racial question in Hawaii and the Philippines; these, in addition to our inability to reach a satisfactory agreement over the Yap dispute, produce what has been denominated our oriental problem, especially when viewed in the light of Japan's war with China in 1894, with Russia in 1904, and her claims at the close of the World War.

THE PURPOSE OF THE ARMS CONFERENCE.

This situation will explain the President's desire to include the discussion of the far eastern and Pacific questions in the arms conference program, and will also explain what appeared to be undue delay in calling the conference.

PROPOSALS ON LIMITATION.

I need not here detail the result of this effort for adjustment, lessened war burdens, and mutual understanding and good will among world powers. The work stands for itself. Suffice it to say that when our Government, on the first day of the conference, abandoned the old methods of argumentation and submitted a plan for acceptance or rejection success was assured. It was unthinkable that any nation would block the course of human progress and peace by refusing to accept such magnanimous proposal, when we were offering to scrap nearly as much as we asked both Great Britain and Japan combined to scrap. It will be noted that the Hughes proposals were quite specific:

1. That all capital-ship building programs, either actual or projected, should be abandoned.
2. That further reduction should be made through the scrapping of certain of the older ships.
3. That, in general, regard should be had to the existing naval strength of the powers concerned.
4. That the capital-ship tonnage should be used as the measurement of strength for navies and a proportionate allowance for auxiliary combatant craft prescribed.

It will also be noted that the final acceptance of these proposals as adopted by all the countries were virtually as originally submitted, preserving every item of principle set forth. So that it is literally true that not only every proposal that day submitted was substantially accepted but the final work on limitation of armament went even further than the proposals, in that it included treaties to limit the operation of the submarine within the bounds of international law and the total abolition of the use of poisonous gases. The accepted proposals included limiting the size of capital ships and auxiliary vessels as well as the size of the guns to be carried. This agreement will permit cutting the usual naval appropriation in half. We should save $200,000,000 on this item alone.

But, Mr. Chairman, vastly more important than that will be the total abandonment of naval rivalry between nations. This is the one outstanding and signal achievement of this part of the program.

PROPOSALS ON PACIFIC COMPOSURE.

Great as was the result in the limitation of armament, it is the general opinion that it fades in comparison with the results on the Far East and Pacific questions. The acute difference between Japan and China, as disclosed by the two positions (1) Japan in her 21 points, the secret treaty of 1915, against which our Nation lodged a protest at the time, and (2) China in her 10 points, indicated the chasm separating the two countries.

Mr. Root, on behalf of the American delegation, presented what may be known as China's Magna Charta in the four items of (1) sovereignty and independence and integrity, both politically and administratively; (2) the provision for internal composure; (3) the open door; and (4) security against outside intervention for any national advantage.

Mr. Chairman, on December 10, 1921, in the fourth plenary conference, this guaranty to China was read when Mr. Hughes virtually called the roll of the world and entered upon the record a unanimous vote on the most sensitive foreign question now before this country.

Then came the report of the quadruple treaty, which opened the way for Japan to concede our contention on Yap Island and for both England and Japan to cancel the offensive Anglo-Japanese alliance, which has been a sore contention for the past 20 years. By these two treaties China won back what through a series of years she had gradually lost, and the Pacific, for years an area of possible disputes and a basis for defensive alliances, has now reached an amicable adjustment, to be sustained by mutual consultation and understanding based upon the good faith of the nations concerned.

In addition to the adjustment of these subjects which were on the agenda, the conference went further than the original proposals. While it was understood that questions covered by treaty obligations, such as the secret treaty of 1915 containing the famous 21 points and the Shantung issue contained in the Versailles treaty, yet it was the position of the American delegates that the Japanese delegates should be willing to enter into conversations with the Chinese delegates on both of these subjects, in the hope of reaching agreement between them. It was the position of the American delegates that since China had not signed the Versailles treaty, the United States felt justified in urging the two nations to seek, if possible, an agreement, which they agreed to do. Failing to reach an agreement, the good offices of Hughes and Balfour were first tendered, and finally the President offered his good offices. The result is a treaty signed by both Japan and China by which Shantung goes back to China and the most regretable wrong of the Versailles treaty was righted, whereupon Britain turned back to China Weihawei. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I regret I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FESS. While the 21 points were not given up by Japan, the serious "group 5" was given up, which was an additional achievement not included in the agenda.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE RESULTS.

Mr. Chairman, as the arms conference not only succeeded in the acceptance of our original proposals but went further by limiting warfare, so the Far East and Pacific problems succeeded beyond the original purposes by finally succeeding in adjustment of items not included in the agenda since they had been covered by treaties.

This is why the head of the British delegation said the achievement went far beyond the hopes of any statesman connected with the conference. It is why Admiral Kato declared the work will live as long as history will live. The result was declared by Lloyd-George in the House of Commons the greatest work for world peace in history. A similar verdict was given by Paul Hymans, president of the League of Nations.

It is perhaps too early to give an estimate of this work. It is not, however, too early to assess it as a part of a program of international comity without a parallel in our history. This Nation in these 12 weeks took lofty strides for world recognition as the great leader among the nations of the world. It is a source of justifiable pride that every proposal submitted which was finally acted upon was made by an American delegate, and every proposal finally acted upon was unanimously accepted by every nation voting in the affirmative. It is with pardonable pride that out of this caldron of almost universal warfare, with every relation more or less strained by both the actual war and the unhappy confusion to follow after the war, this Nation has emerged with its sovereignty and independence intact, its rights all conserved, its disputes all composed, its rivalries all allayed, its friendships with all nations strengthened, and its moral leadership universally conceded, the wrongs to China corrected, and the way opened for composure in the Orient. I challenge the record to produce a greater achievement in the history of diplomacy. So much on the progress of our foreign policy and problems.

OTHER DEPARTMENTS BUSY.

While this service is under the State Department, every other department under the Executive is confronted with serious problems inherited from the war, demanding a type of talent not called for before these problems of readjustment appeared. The other members of the Cabinet are grappling with like success the questions coming within their province, only less stirring because of the less dramatic character of the problems. The work of readjustment from war to peace conditions affects every department whether of defensive, legal, agriculture, interior, post office, commerce, or labor. Their work more or less depends upon the cooperation of the legislative department, with which they are in frequent consultation.

PEACE RESTORED BY CONGRESSIONAL RESOLUTION.

The work of the administration since the 4th of March last viewed from that angle demands the admiration of every citizen who knows the facts. One of the most critical yet imperative measures demanding attention was the establishment of peace to end the intolerable situation of a continuance of technical war two years after the end of actual war; critical because the indemnity had not yet been fixed against Germany; imperative because resumption of neither diplomatic nor trade relations could be secured until after peace was declared. Soon after the indemnity was fixed war was ended by congressional resolution signed by the President, by which our former relations have been established.

SITUATION FOUND BY PRESIDENT HARDING.

The domestic problems were as seriously complicated. Mr. Harding found a public debt of about $25,000,000,000. The unfunded debt was about $3,000,000,000. The enormity of war is suggested by the fact that the appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1919, were $27,065,000,000. He found a war-time taxation measure rapidly drying up the sources of revenue and a deranged credit that caused Liberties to range at 15 per cent discount. He found a too rapid liquidation of agriculture which threatened bankruptcy for many engaged in that first and foremost important industry of the country, involving nearly one-half our population. He found insufficient protection of the country against undesirable immigration, now flooding the country to avoid the burdens of war-torn Europe, thus further increasing our inevitable unemployment. He saw an inflated business situation struggling to continue on a too high cost level of production.

PROGRAM OF ECONOMY AND ITS PROGRESS.

The administration through Congress outlined its program of economy:

(1) Dismantle the war machine as rapidly as possible.
(2) Establish at the earliest possible moment a national Budget system.
(3) Reduce every appropriation to the minimum consistent with efficient service.
(4) Guard against all duplication and wasteful expenditure.
(5) Delay every new measure carrying additional Treasury burdens, except such legislation as appears emergent or absolutely necessary.

Mr. Chairman, let us note how this program is being carried out. The war-dismantling process is proceeding. Here in the Capital we have reduced the pay roll, which in 1919 was 119,000, to about 73,000. The large increase over 1917, which was 37,000 in that year, is found in the War Risk Insurance, the Internal Revenue Office, the Shipping Board, and so forth. In the entire country we have dropped 320,278 employees from the roll.

One of the earliest measures enacted was the Budget law, which went into effect the 1st of last July. It will be recalled that this bill was passed by Congress but vetoed by President Wilson. The progress already achieved will cause this law to stand out as the most important piece of constructive legislation in the past quarter century. It definitely puts an end to all "pork-barrel" legislation, and is an effectual barrier against wasteful expenditures. When the plan of the Committee on Reorganization of the Government Departments, which is now before the President, is adopted, the Budget system will defeat all unnecessary duplication. It is succeeding somewhat in that direction without the reorganization proposed.

STATEMENT OF THE CHAIRMAN OF THE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE.

The success in economy is shown by the following statement handed me by the head of the Appropriations Committee, the real economy body of the Government:

The appropriations for 1922 were $4,065,000,000, and the estimates were $5,600,000,000, showing an approximate reduction of $1,600,000,000. These estimates were submitted by a Democratic administration and the appropriations were made by a Republican Congress.

The estimates for the fiscal year 1923, which begins July 1 next, submitted by the present administration, are $3,853,000,000. It is too early to say how much the appropriations will be, but I estimate them at $3,500,000,000.

Each of these figures include the Post Office cost, which amounts to $550,000,000 a year.

There are now three fixed items of charges approaching $2,000,000,000 which did not exist before the war, as follows: $975,000,000 interest on the public debt; $381,000,000 sinking fund; and approximately $500,000,000 for the cost of the Veterans' Bureau in connection with the care of the wounded soldiers. There are other items like the shipping industry and increased outlay for law enforcement to be added to these three.

It will be seen that these three fixed charges can not be eliminated, so we begin to make provision for the operation of the Government after we cease providing these two billion of fixed charges created by the war.

If you deduct the two billions from the $3,500,000,000, which I estimate will be the aggregate of the appropriations for 1923, it will be seen that we have only $1,500,000,000 for the conduct of every activity of the Government, including the Army and Navy, which is only $250,000,000 more than the cost of the Government before the war, and $150,000,000 of this is represented in the increased volume of business done by the Post Office Department, so that when we take the $250,000,000 and deduct the increased volume of postal business, $150,000,000, we will only be as low as the people of the United States can expect the Government to be conducted.

The annual revenue from the liquor business before the enactment of the Volstead Act was approximately $290,000,000. The revenue now from the same source is $83,000,000. The cost of enforcement of prohibition is $9,250,000 a year.

If the figures I have estimated as being the cost for 1923 are developed into fact, and I think they will be, we will be the only country in the world that is living within its revenues. The estimates of $3,853,000,000 we have now are $250,000,000 above the estimated revenues, but we are going to cut them down and be within the revenues.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM OF READJUSTMENT.

Upon the inauguration of the President and his call of the special session of Congress a program of industrial and agricultural rehabilitation was outlined. Congress immediately set about to enact it into law. To secure our labor from a flood of European immigration we enacted a law limiting immigration to but 3 per cent of the nationals already in America. This law is being rigidly enforced. To protect American labor and industry from a flood of cheaper-made goods tariff revision was undertaken. In order to protect the farmer, who was hardest hit, because of his helplessness against the crushing effect of an immediate liquidation that carried his products far below the prewar price, an elaborate program was carried out.

AGRICULTURAL REHABILITATION.

The emergency tariff was enacted at once and became law May 27, 1921. It was renewed November 16, 1921, and will stand until the permanent law is enacted. A similar law was enacted to protect dyes and chemicals. Two measures were passed last July and August looking to extension of credits through the Farm Loan Board and Federal land banks. The purpose of these amendments was to assist the farmer in securing necessary funds upon satisfactory securities. One of the amendments placed $25,000,000 additional for the disposal of such extensions. Two protective measures were enacted into law upon the strong representation of the agricultural interests. The first, known as the packers' bill, became a law August 2 last year. The second, known as the grain futures bill, became a law August 23. On August 24 the exportation of farm products bill became a law. This permits the War Finance Corporation to loan to foreign business houses upon satisfactory security sums not totaling beyond $500,000,000 to be expended in the purchase of American farm products to aid our exportation. On the 18th of February this year the President signed the cooperative marketing of farm products bill, a measure that passed the House nearly a year ago and awaited action in the Senate. In addition to these measures an Agricultural Inquiry Commission, authorized by Congress, is now at work collecting data on farm problems.

I challenge the record to show an equal program for farm rehabilitation. The substantial effects of these efforts are materializing throughout the country, as is evidenced by the various reports from all parts of the country. Wheat, which by the failure of the European market, with our market open to all nations, was carried to points below the prewar level, sold yesterday from $1.28¼ for July wheat to $1.47½ for May wheat. On the same day corn was selling for 66¼ cents. Live stock was keeping pace with these two staple articles. These are definite results of protective legislation, especially the emergency tariff and agricultural export aid laws.

In addition to these measures in aid of agriculture the good roads bill, carrying $75,000,000 appropriation, became law in November. This will not only aid the farm industries but will relieve the unemployment situation somewhat.

REMEDIAL LEGISLATION.

Several measures of remedial character were also enacted. Last July the Postal Service employees compensation measure took effect, which directly affects a service in which are engaged an army of people and for which the vast sum of over a half billion dollars per year is expended. The civil service retirement bill was also enacted into law. The Patent Office was given necessary relief. The Veterans' Bureau was created, reorganizing and concentrating all the agencies having to do with the disabled veterans under one head. This assures more expedition as well as more adequate treatment of our disabled service men, which has been the source of so much complaint and dissatisfaction. The Government has already expended more than $1,500,000,000 in this service. The present year it will amount to one-half billion dollars. This bureau has adjudicated about 751,000 cases, leaving only about 130,000 cases still pending. Of nearly 840,000 cases of requests for a medical examination only about 14,000 await action. It will be entirely caught up by July.

PROBLEMS BEFORE THE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

While this work was being carried on the Committee on Ways and Means was battling in turn with tariff, taxation, and foreign debt funding measures.

The committee held hearings on tariff revision and reported the bill to the House July 6, 1921. It was made in order by special rule July 12 and passed the House July 21, when it went to the Senate, where it is now being considered in committee.

On August 16 the Ways and Means Committee reported to the House the taxation measure. It passed the House four days later. It passed the Senate in an amended form in November and became law in December. This measure repealed the excess-profits tax, reduced and revised the high surtax, repealed the transportation tax and some of the nuisance taxes, and increased the exemption slightly. It reduced the people's tax bill $818,000,000 per year.

PROGRESSIVE LEGISLATION.

Among constructive and relief measures the Women's Bureau was created to respond to the new duties of women enfranchisement. The maternity bill was enacted in response to a wide demand of the womanhood of the country. It is the first item of an ambitious program for progressive legislation espoused by the women in their new sphere of political activity. The state of the Federal Treasury prevents early action on the balance of the program.

Likewise the program of Federal aid to education and public welfare is for the same reason somewhat delayed. A part of this program will be taken up for action as soon as the committee on reorganization makes its report to Congress. This report is now before the President awaiting agreement by the Cabinet members whose departments are being reorganized.

FOREIGN DEBTS REFUNDING LAW.

The foreign debts bill has now become a law, which authorizes a commission to take immediate steps to fund these debts, thereby placing them in form in which they can be financed. This is a most important step both for Europe and the United States in that it is an announcement to all countries that these obligations must be respected, and will induce Europe to set her house in order to meet the situation by balancing their budgets, in an effort to keep their expenditures within their income. So long as Europe insists in increasing their debts by maintaining useless standing armies larger than before the war there is no hope for Europe. This legislation is a salutary suggestion of a proper policy for the debtor countries.

RUSSIAN RELIEF.

Among relief measures two looking to relief of the starving people of Russia were enacted into law, one to donate $20,000,000 for food and to purchase seed grain for the famished in the Volga region, and the other to release medicines now held by the War Department to be applied in relief of the sick of the same unhappy country.

The rail-securities refunding proposal, looking to the rehabilitation of the finances of transportation, was passed by the House and is now awaiting action in the Senate. It is estimated that this measure will greatly assist in the relief of unemployment in the country.

BASIS OF TAX REVISION.

In this survey of the year's work it will be observed that the administration met the problems of readjustment as they came from the preceding administration with all their confusion. Knowing that the measure of high taxation was the high cost of Government, it set at once to reduce that cost. Its progress was as follows:

The cost in 1919 was $19,000,000,000.
The cost in 1920 was $7,500,000,000.
The cost in 1921 was $6,500,000,000.
The cost in 1922 was $4,065,000,000.

Upon the prospects of getting the cost to near $3,500,000,000 the taxation law was revised, and we hope it may be further reduced later on.

Owing to the acute suffering of agriculture due in most parts to cutting off the European market resulting from a too rapid liquidation and great distress the before-mentioned constructive program was outlined and written into law without delay.

Steps were also taken to improve the industrial situation.

In order to further encourage capital to invest in the employment of our own labor, tariff legislation is now in progress in the Senate, the House having already acted. It is somewhat delayed because of new and untried conditions confronting a dislocated industrial world. The highway bill was enacted that will help to reduce unemployment. The rail securities refunding act has been urged as an agency of the employment of many unemployed. The President had called his unemployment conference which organized and set in motion the machinery for lessening unemployment. The Departments of Labor and Commerce are cooperating to find employment of both capital and labor.

THE COUNTRY BASICALLY SOUND.

The year closes with all the basic elements of prosperous conditions present.

1. Agriculture much better, as is evidenced by the price current of all agricultural products.

2. Transportation constantly becoming more efficient as it gradually increases in efficiency and through various economies is reducing the cost of operation. Freight rates must come down before agriculture and general business can become normal.

3. Manufacturing is on the increase. Surplus goods are rapidly going, shelves are becoming less filled, and buying must again increase which will increase the demand upon the manufacturer.

4. Such basic industries as steel are increasing. Many mills until recently closed are starting up, especially in the Pittsburgh district. Auto industry, including rubber, is on the increase. Our banking system is of the first order. Rediscounts have dropped almost 50 per cent since the high mark in time of war. Money is getting easier, interest is lower, and rents are gradually lowering in most places.

5. Our managerial ability is first class, only somewhat distressed over the war handicaps still on capital which discourage against investment.

6. Our labor is in better spirit, and a better relation between labor and capital is displayed by a willingness to get together and find through mutual agreement a lower level of cost of production to avoid the inevitable suffering from the slow process of economic demand which while it is sure is most hurtful.

Here are the basic elements of our country's welfare. Resumption of normal conditions mean that all the world must again go to work and upon such a basis that the public can afford to buy. Capital must be allowed to have a reasonable profit, but not permitted to profiteer at the expense of the public. Labor must have a good wage, but it must not be on a silk-shirt and hose basis of expenditure, by maintaining high cost at the price of inefficiency. Both profiteering and reckless extravagance, by whosoever indulged, are elements of cost which the public in the last analysis pays and against which it strikes, hence the loss of the market and increased unemployment and general suffering.

EUROPE'S PROBLEMS AWAIT SOLUTION.

Europe provokes our pity, yet Europe must see her remedy in the one old-fashioned law "work and save," or Europe will collapse. Our country can not continue to loan to her when she protests her inability to pay even the interest on the debt she owes us. Her solicitation for us to cancel what she owes us is both unwise for her and for us.

No nation will work to the maximum of its ability so long as it can borrow and never need to look to the pay day. For this reason we have ordered the foreign debt of $11,000,000,000 funded, that it may be financed in order that it may be realized upon, and Europe may see her obligation to us for our part in determining the World War on behalf of the Allies as against the enemy.

RECONSTRUCTION DEMANDS.

While we are concerned over our ability to assist Europe to resume her buying power, the administration has been most concerned in the increase of the consumptive power of our own people. The construction needs of the immediate future are commanding and only await a safe basis of cost. Transportation improvements in terminal facilities, rail equipment, and bridge rebuilding as well as highway building call for an immense outlay of capital, which is estimated to be at least $7,000,000,000 in the next seven years.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

The administration is committed to the building and maintaining an American merchant marine. Last Tuesday the President pointed out to Congress a plan in which he submitted concrete proposals for the establishment of this great American agency of commerce which, when in full operation, will not only carry our overseas commerce in American bottoms, thus employing American labor and capital, but will continue the industry of the American shipyards which in time will not only employ our labor to build and repair the needed ships for our own trade but much of the trade of other countries.

The steady growth of transportation needs demanded by a growing population on the one hand and the complete suspension of transportation extension for the past decade on the other must stimulate the activities in production, both of mines and manufactories, retarded at first by the overexpansion of war demands, then suspended by the inevitable relaxation in the aftermath, and now awaiting a sound basis for resumption.

THE FUTURE OUTLOOK.

While industry is struggling to find a solid basis for rebuilding, every symptom indicates a promising future. In addition to the promise in agriculture, transportation is becoming more prosperous. The steel industry, as well as copper, is on the increase. Basic manufacturing, such as the motor industry, together with its auxiliaries, is on a pronounced upgrade.

Unemployment is decreasing, and a steady effort is displayed between labor and capital to find an amicable basis for adjustment with due respect for the rights of both in the interest of the public. The administration has been at work to secure a better relationship between the forces of production.

Money is growing easier, interest rates are lowering, rediscount rates, which during the war were 7 per cent, have been reduced to 4½ per cent. Liberties, which were discounted one year ago at 15 per cent, have advanced until to-day some denominations are selling above par. Securities are advancing and reinvestments are on the increase. The last report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows a vastly improved condition of the banks over a year ago. These are but few of the unmistakable evidences of a return to a sound basis of prosperity.

DEMOCRATIC PROPAGANDA.

Mr. Chairman, persistent propaganda by the enemy has charged that this Congress has done nothing. The charge is not made seriously, and, of course, not upon the responsibility of any responsible Member. It is the last and only hope of a discredited party, whose tenure in office was the most costly experiment our Nation has ever suffered and we pray will never have to suffer again. With a record of debauch never witnessed before in the annals of time, bequeathing to the present administration a state of demoralization so hopeless that the people rebuked it by the most overwhelming majority ever cast in the history of elections, it now comes forth, disarmed for any constructive proposal, and after a studied resistance of every constructive measure looking to clean up the miserable mess complain before the country because we have not in the short space of one year been able to give relief for the evils of years of Democratic mismanagement.

The repudiated leader recently announced that, "We stand in the same tracks in which we stood in 1920." The party leaders here in Congress, not quite so bold but nevertheless as equally anxious because of their standing before the country utterly repudiated, can find no defense save the sham charge that Congress has not succeeded in correcting the evils of Democratic policies.

THE RECORD SPEAKS FOR ITSELF.

Mr. Chairman, we admit the task was great, but the record of the present year is made up. It has been one of the busiest of the country's Congresses. The record shows 70 House bills, 16 Senate bills, 51 House resolutions, and 15 Senate resolutions for the first session, or a total of 152. The second session met last December 5. The record shows 57 House bills, 24 Senate bills, 5 House resolutions, and 4 Senate resolutions, or 90. That makes a total of 242, or nearly 2 measures for each day Congress was in session.

The short session is usually confined to the supply bills. Already 8 of the 12 annual appropriation bills have been passed through the House, 5 of which have passed the Senate. This progress defies criticism as the most advanced stage yet reached in the history of legislation in the long session of Congress. This it must be remembered was in addition to the 90 measures before referred to for only three months of the regular session.

THE VERDICT NOT IN DOUBT.

Mr. Chairman, one year ago Warren G. Harding found the Nation with her relations with many foreign countries strained to almost the breaking point, her fundamental principles under discussion, her historic significance in question, her population surfeited with the profits of war and wild extravagance, her industries inflated by overexpansion from war demands, and problems of reconstruction, complicated and imminent.

To-day he sees peace again established with all countries, foreign relations resumed with honor to ourselves and complete justice to others, the finest attitude of the world toward our moral leadership as evinced in the arms conference, a policy of proper regard for the defenders of the Nation's rights, an economic administration upon the soundest principles of economy, a reduction of our public funded debt to the amount of $2,000,000,000 and a reduction of our floating debt of $700,000,000, a reduced taxation of over three quarters of a billion dollars per year, a rejuvenated agriculture and industrial fabric sorely distressed by the havoc of war, the prospect of general employment of American labor in American industries, the only country which is not only balancing its budget but has really reduced the war debt, has restored her credit, and displays signs of promise on all hands of a resumption again of our happy and promising stage which preceded the inauguration of the Democratic foibles of the new freedom and policies of suspicion and persecution of success.

Such is the achievement of the first year of the Harding administration, which, in the main, has been resisted inch by inch by a solid Democratic vote, and with which we gladly go to the country for the people's verdict. We gladly accept the challenge of our friends the enemy to take their stand on the League of Nations as their remedy in readjustment and present the record of this administration for the people's decision. Of the result there can be no doubt. The people are too close to the last administration to fail to connect effect back to cause. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the above remarks:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Can the gentleman yield me more time?

Mr. MADDEN. My time is all allotted. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield the gentleman from Ohio five minutes?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I wish I could, but I have only an hour. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a list of the measures which have become laws within the year I here append under leave granted me to extend my remarks:

BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS WHICH HAVE BECOME LAWS—FIRST SESSION.

HOUSE BILLS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, we have just witnessed the most remarkable incident in the Congress that has happened in 20 years. An administration coming into power with the greatest majority in the history of the Republic on the anniversary of its accession the chief of the Republican organization, the most distinguished performer of the House of Representatives, when it comes to making black look white and two and two add up eight, is put forth in defense of that administration. But, Mr. Chairman, why the necessity of this defense? What occasioned these directors of the Republican organization to put their heads together and to present their chief in front in order to apologize for what has been done in the past year. It results from Republican editorials throughout the United States in which editors have analyzed the conduct and the performance of your party for 12 months. They have rendered a solemn verdict—as you said a solemn verdict was rendered last November a year ago—and they have decided that the accomplishments are nil, and the result is that you call upon this distinguished doctor, this professor of all knowledge, this camouflage artist from Ohio, the chairman of your congressional organization, to come in, and if he can, make new promises and prophecies for the next few months. How did you get into office? By promises. Promises were the main element in your campaign of two years ago. What is your statement to-day? "I made you these promises, I gave you my plighted faith, I gave you my note of hand," as BEN HUMPHREYS would say, "and it has come due, and now I am willing to renew the promise." What does the doctor say? Why, he says, "Whenever you pass a tariff bill then you will renew prosperity in this country." Another promise: "When we shall have passed the reclassification bill we will cut down the expenditures and eliminate offices which we promised to eliminate." "When the Senate shall have passed the railroad appropriation bill, then the railroads of the country will function."

This is all in his speech, but he did not read it to you on this occasion. How is he going to apologize for the Senate failing for eight months to report a tariff bill? How is he going to apologize and defend, if you please, the want of action on your part in failing to carry out your promise with regard to H. R. No. 1? I imagine that some of you will ask yourselves that question, and I see some of you now who will not undertake to defend the Senate's action, and yet the Senate is a part of your organization. I know and you know that Warren Harding is much stronger than his party at the present time. You want to ride in on his shoulders, but remember when you do that you have got to account for the failure to keep his promises made during the election and which he himself has failed to keep. I recall that it was said on the stump and throughout the country that Woodrow Wilson had appointed ambassadors and foreign ministers who were unsuited to their places.

Is there a man on that side of the House who will rise in his place and say at this moment that the American Government has not the poorest representatives in foreign countries that it has had in 50 years, some of them being a disgrace? I do not see anyone getting up to defend them. That is one of the promises you made. Gentlemen, you can defend broken promises by making additional promises if you desire, but I caution you now not to go to agriculture and tell its followers that they are prosperous, or to the manufacturers and tell them they are getting along well, when their smokestacks have no smoke coming from them. When you carried the election agriculture was prosperous and manufacturing was prosperous. What are they to-day? Separated from the smoke of the factories and from the farms, 4,000,000 men are hunting for employment, with necessity staring them in the face. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it would be amusing if it were not attended with so much tragedy to our Republican friends on the other side of this Chamber to note the very earnest and frequent but futile efforts which have been made by many of our Republican colleagues to stem the irresistible tide of opposition which has arisen against their party on account of the failure of this Congress and the administration to comply with its promises and give the necessary relief to the country. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], one of the leaders of his party occupying the position of chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee, comes forward with a carefully prepared political speech in the effort to show that the administration during the past year has accomplished something in the way of relief for the people. It is significant that in all the speeches made by these gentlemen none of them have referred to or criticized the many constructive measures that were passed under a Democratic administration before our country became engaged in war. We never hear any mention nor do we hear any criticism of the fact that it was a Democratic Congress under a Democratic President which put the income tax upon the statute books, making wealth bear at least a part of its proper burden of government. We never hear any mention nor do we hear any criticism from the other side of the fact that it was a Democratic Congress and a Democratic administration which passed the Federal reserve banking law that wrested control of our finances from Wall Street and made it possible for this country to go through the war and to actually win the war without any particular financial difficulty. We never hear any mention nor do we hear any criticism from our friends upon the other side of the fact that it was a Democratic Congress and a Democratic administration which placed upon our statute books the farm loan act, the greatest constructive measure ever passed by Congress for the aid of the farmer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A Democratic Congress and administration first provided for Federal aid for the building of good roads and many other equally beneficial measures, to which I have not the time to refer. In his difficult task to show that this Republican Congress has not been a do-nothing Congress, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has actually counted the bills and resolutions which have been passed, and says Congress has passed nearly two a day. To what a desperate strait has this Republican leader been driven in his effort to show that this Congress has really accomplished something! Why, everyone knows that these bills were practically all bridge bills and claims and pensions and matters of no general public interest. Why, yesterday we passed three bills of no general interest in less than two hours, and there is hardly a unanimous-consent day that from 15 to 25 bills, and sometimes more, are not passed without objection. Read his speech and you will find that he has been unable to point out any real constructive measure which has been passed. Oh, but he spends much time praising the result of the recent Disarmament Conference which the President was forced to call by a few Republican insurgents, aided by the Democratic minority. He boasts that the United States has joined Great Britain, France, and Japan in an alliance to keep the peace in the Pacific Ocean, and at the same time denounces the League of Nations which proposed an alliance of all the nations of the world to keep the peace of the world. That is about as consistent as we would expect the gentleman to be in discussing a political question. We can not escape the conclusion that, like many other political statesmen, he is influenced by the fact that one was brought forth under a Republican administration, whereas the other was the product of a Democratic administration. Does anyone doubt what the position of the gentleman would be if conditions had been reversed?

This opposition which has arisen to your party, gentlemen, is a perfectly natural one, and one which is to be expected on account of the failure of the administration and this Congress to give that relief which was promised the people in the last campaign, and which the people have been vainly expecting since your President came into power. The business and manufacturing interests of the country are depressed. How have you helped them? As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has said, millions of laboring men are walking the streets to-day, and they are on the highways begging employment, and nothing has been done. No legislation has been passed, and seemingly no consideration has been given to any effort to give those men employment. Farmers all over this country we know are being forced to put the products of their labor and their farms upon the market at less than the cost of production. What have you done by way of giving them substantial relief? Why, it became necessary at the other end of this Capitol for a few Republican Senators to form themselves in what has been called an "agricultural bloc," in order that they might join a Democratic minority in the Senate and force consideration of measures intended for the relief of the agricultural interests of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] referred to the expenses of the Government and to the action of Congress in reducing expenses. As I recall, he said that this is one of the two or three Governments of the world that have a balanced budget. I do not know just what the gentleman means by a balanced budget. I take it that what he means is that our revenue equals our expenses.

That is rather a remarkable statement for the distinguished gentleman to make in the face of the fact that the President of the United States, when he submitted his budget in December, stated that there would be a deficit this year of $24,000,000 at least. And since that time, Congress has added to that deficit by passing certain legislation which will increase it all the way from $7,000,000 to $20,000,000. It is a rather remarkable statement for the gentleman from Ohio to make in the face of the statement of the President that next year, the fiscal year of 1923, the deficit in our Treasury will amount to over $167,000,000. And since that statement was made it has been amended, and now everyone agrees that the deficit in 1923 will amount to at least $250,000,000. And the Secretary of the Treasury has said that it will amount to $300,000,000. So I say it is rather remarkable that the gentleman from Ohio, even though he may be making a political speech for public consumption, should say that this country is now working under a balanced budget.

The appropriations made for 1922 in the regular appropriation bills amounted to $3,771,900,514.01. In addition to that, we are now considering a third deficiency bill. The two deficiency bills passed in August and December carried aggregate appropriations of $155,833,766.64. The pending bill carries an appropriation, if passed as reported by the committee, of $108,415,287, or total deficiences up to this time and for this year of $264,249,053.64. The gentleman from Ohio referred to the further fact that Congress has been called upon by the President to pass a ship subsidy bill, which, if passed by Congress, will result in taking from the Public Treasury, already faced as it is with these large deficits, $32,000,000 of the people's money each year, and handing it over to the great private ship-operating companies.

The best answer that can be made to the gentleman from Ohio in his claim for economy is to compare the appropriations made for this fiscal year in the regular annual appropriation bills with the estimates submitted by the President and his Bureau of the Budget for the expenses of the Government during the next fiscal year. The President and his Bureau of the Budget asked Congress to appropriate for 1923 the sum of $3,858,917,924.53. The outstanding and unanswerable fact is that the appropriations requested by the President for 1923 are $87,017,410.52 more than Congress appropriated in the regular annual appropriations for the year 1922. Does that speak for economy? Does that show that this Congress and the Republican administration have been practicing economy? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Does that show that the Budget Bureau, so highly complimented by the gentleman from Ohio, has been functioning as the people of the United States expected it would function? Does that show that there has been that close and careful consideration of future expenditures by this bureau and the President that we expected would be given before these estimates were sent in?

Why, gentlemen will remember that this increase of over $87,000,000 in the appropriations of 1923 over those of 1922 is requested in the face of the fact that it will be five years since the war came to a close, and instead of our reducing the expenses of the Government, if we act in accordance with the earnest request of the President and the Bureau of the Budget, we shall appropriate over $87,000,000 more in the regular appropriation bills for 1923 than was appropriated in the year 1922, and then you may expect, during the next Congress and after the election, to see other large deficiency bills coming in, adding to these appropriations, just as we have had deficiency bills in this Congress adding to the appropriations for 1922.

Why, gentlemen, it has been nearly four years since the war closed and will be five years when the appropriations for 1923 are expended—we ought to be at least approaching prewar conditions, and the gentleman from Ohio admits it—let us compare the appropriations requested with the appropriations made during the last year just preceding the war, the year 1916. What do we find? Why, in 1916, under a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President, there was appropriated the sum of $1,114,937,012.32.

Oh, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] said, if I recall correctly, that when you deducted the interest of $975,000,000, and approximately $500,000,000 which is being provided for the Veterans' Bureau, and $381,000,000 for the sinking fund, expenses which he very properly said were not charges on the Treasury before the war, it would be found that we were going to appropriate for next year only about $250,000,000 more than was appropriated in 1916.

Let us see. We do not know what Congress is going to appropriate. I take it, certainly, that Congress will reduce the estimates; but the only thing that we can do at this time is to look at what the President of the United States has requested Congress to appropriate, and, as I said, he has asked Congress to appropriate something over $3,858,000,000. Well, deduct, if you please, these three sums which have been referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, and which amount to $1,856,000,000; or take the figure that he gave and call it $2,000,000,000, because the little sum of $146,000,000 does not seem to make much difference to the gentleman from Ohio for the purposes of his speech. Deduct your $2,000,000,000 from the amount asked to be appropriated and you will have left $1,858,000,000, which is $743,000,000 in round numbers more than was appropriated in the year 1916.

Now, is it any wonder that the taxpayers of this country are complaining because there has not been that reduction in our expenditures which they were led to believe would be made, and which they had the right to expect would be made five years after the war had come to a close?

One of the most distressing things—and I get that by inference from what the gentleman from Ohio said; it may be in that prepared speech that he said he was going to put into the RECORD—one of the most distressing things I gathered from his speech was that he, one of the leaders of his party and a man who has great influence in Congress, takes the position that the expenses will be reduced next year to as complete an extent as the people can expect for some years to come; in other words, that the people, so long as his party is in power, or for the next three years, may not expect any further reduction in expenditures or any further reduction in their taxes. If, therefore, they expect reductions in appropriations and in taxes they must turn to the Democratic Party for relief. And legislative history will show that this has always been the case. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, the gentleman had something to say in reference to the reduction in the number of employees. I think he said that they had reduced the number of employees in the District of Columbia to something like 73,000. The facts are that on December 31 there were 75,759 employees, as shown by the report of the Civil Service Commission, here in the District of Columbia, and as showing what a rapid reduction is being made in the number of employees here in the District in one month that number has been reduced by the enormous sum of 401; or, on January 31, there were 75,358 employees in the District of Columbia, and in the field there were 492,567 employees; or, on December 31, 1921, the total number of employees of the National Government in the District and in the field was 568,326.

Now, do you wonder that the people of this country are asking just why it is necessary to retain, four years after the war, such a great number of employees at their expense? Are you wondering that the people of the country now are asking the question as to why some action has not been taken to cut out some of these employees and save the public money?

Certainly the people have a right to expect that four years after the war we get back to something like prewar conditions in the matter of public employment in this country.

Why, let me tell you something. Something has been said here about how the Veterans' Bureau has reduced its employees. What do we find? The Veterans' Bureau has here in the city of Washington 5,092 employees. But how many have they got in the field? Under the decentralization bill, which was passed by this Congress, there are now 13,500 employees of the Veterans' Bureau in the field, making the total number of employees of the Veterans' Bureau something over 18,500. Is it any wonder that there are those who complain against the great overhead charges and expenses of the bureau which takes money out of the pockets of the disabled soldier—who is so frequently and properly commended upon this floor—which takes money out of his pocket for the purpose of putting upon our pay rolls a great number of employees to whom large amounts are paid in salaries? Gentlemen will have a very difficult task to show that this Congress and this administration has shown any real economy.

My time is limited, but I want to talk to you just a little while about this bill. I have been led away from a discussion of the measure before the House by the remarks just made by my friend from Ohio.

The total amount carried on the face of this bill, as I have already stated, is $108,415,287.13. All of this sum is for the year 1922 except $4,105,468.27, of which $3,936,409.03 represents judgments which have been obtained against the Government and claims which have been regularly audited during the past year, leaving an actual deficiency for past years in this bill of $169,059.24.

The big items in this bill are $93,993,112 for the Veterans' Bureau and $5,000,000 for the Colombian treaty. But I wish to repeat that every appropriation carried in this bill, except the sum of $4,105,468.27 to which I have referred, is by way of a supplemental appropriation for expenses during the present fiscal year. You may call them anticipated deficiencies, because, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said, the committee cut out many requests for appropriations where it was not perfectly patent that they would not have money to carry them through the present fiscal year; but this sum should be added to the appropriations made for the present fiscal year, 1922, and shows that Congress either did not appropriate sufficient money in the first instance or that some of the departments have been extravagant.

In addition to this there are certain appropriations to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has referred, and to which I want to refer just for a few minutes. For instance, we found that there was a deficiency for 1921 in the Navy Department of $4,394,806.25. That is cared for in this bill by making available the balances which were in the Treasury to the credit of the Navy Department on June 30, 1921. In other words, there was a balance covered back into the Treasury by the Navy Department, which was unexpended out of the 1921 appropriation, of something over $11,000,000, and the committee undertakes to satisfy this deficiency of 1921 out of that balance. Well, of course, it is properly chargeable to 1921 expenses, but to my mind that is an improper way to make this appropriation, and so far as I know that practice has never been followed in any other deficiency bill of which I have knowledge. The usual course is to appropriate the money directly and to appropriate it as a deficiency for the fiscal year in which the deficiency was incurred. The $11,000,000 of balance is in the Treasury, and it is only by an appropriation act that it can be taken out of the Treasury; and in order to keep your books straight, in order that the country may know and that Congress may know just what is being appropriated, it seems to me that the better policy and the only proper policy would be to make a direct appropriation, just as all other deficiency bills have done in the past.

Now, what more? The committee has allowed $10,000,000 for the Navy Department as a supplement to the present year's appropriation, but it did not make that appropriation in a direct manner. The Secretary of the Navy came before the committee and told us that he had effected savings from certain appropriations which had been specifically made for various activities in the department of $7,680,345, and the committee, by a provision in this bill, makes that sum available to meet this supplemental appropriation of $10,000,000, and as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said the Navy Department is expected to make up the balance through savings between now and July 1.

Then there is $40,000,000 to take care of the Navy's deficit in the Treasury in the clothing and small-stores fund. Instead of appropriating the necessary sums to take care of this deficit, it is proposed by legislation to wipe it off the books. It may be said that it means the same thing, but it conceals from the public the real facts. The same is true of a supplemental appropriation for the Army of $511,892.77 for 1922 for bringing back troops from Germany, and $236,095 for reconditioning the Madawaska, and $150,000 for expenses incurred in 1921 during the mine troubles in West Virginia, or a total of $897,987.77, which is not directly appropriated, but is made available out of funds to the credit of the War Department, which would otherwise remain in the Treasury. The result is that the public is told through the newspapers that this bill carries only $108,415,287.13, whereas in reality it makes available the sum of $163,708,081.15. The people are thus mislead by this procedure into the belief that Congress is appropriating less by over $55,000,000 than is really being appropriated. It is this that I earnestly condemn. There ought not to be any camouflage about appropriations. The people ought to be told the real facts.

Right here I want to call your attention to this fact: You will recall that when the tax bill was pending before the Ways and Means Committee it was stated that there was going to be effected a saving out of the appropriations for this year of $350,000,000, and it was stated that $100,000,000 of that would come out of the Navy Department. This was heralded all over the country for the benefit of the taxpaying public and as a great accomplishment of the Bureau of the Budget. The Secretary of the Navy now tells us, after eight months of the fiscal year have passed, that he has saved only $7,680,345. The $100,000,000 has dwindled to $7,680,000, with the hope on the part of the committee that possibly the Secretary of the Navy may in some way save $2,500,000 more before July 1.

The President told us a few weeks ago, acting on information, of course, which was furnished him by the Director of the Budget, that there had been direct savings of $32,000,000 and indirect savings of $134,000,000 already effected during the year. Eight months of the year have passed, and even if this statement was true, it shows how grossly the people have been deceived, for there is a great difference between $136,000,000 and $350,000,000. I introduced a resolution asking the President to tell Congress just where those savings had been effected. It was my idea that when we knew where those savings could be found it would be possible either to avoid presenting a deficiency bill which carries $108,000,000, or $18,000,000 less than he says have been saved during this year, or, preferably, that those sums could be covered into the Treasury so as to put them beyond the power of any Government official to spend between now and July 1. I betray no confidence, I am sure, when I say that that resolution was promptly sent to the President asking that he comply with the request made therein, and for that reason, hoping that he would make reply, I have not sought to press the matter before the House. But the very fact that we have had no reply to that resolution is the surest evidence of the truth of the charge that has been made upon this floor that those savings are mere paper savings. It is a mere fanciful saving from the extravagances of the department which the Director of the Budget assumes he has made, but on which he can not put his finger, and hence his failure to supply Congress with the details.

We know there ought to have been considerable savings. The appropriations for this fiscal year were made at the December, 1920, session. Since that time the cost of material and supplies, printing and binding, fuel, rations for our Army and Navy, construction and repairs, and a multitude of other supplies, have greatly diminished in cost. The appropriations were based on the old high cost. Hence a saving would quite naturally result unless, forsooth, it has been consumed in other ways. Is this the reason why we have not been furnished with a bill of particulars as to just where these alleged savings are? I do not believe there has been any saving, because if there had been you can rest assured that it would have been reported to this Congress, and the committee would have done just as it did in the case of the Navy Department. It would have made those savings available for these deficiencies and not reported out direct appropriations. The only instance of saving that the committee has found is this $7,000,000 on the part of the Navy Department and the $900,000 in the War Department, and the committee have made that available for deficiencies in those departments.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio talks about cutting the estimates for next year by $250,000,000, which is in itself a severe indictment of the President who submitted these estimates and who is directly responsible therefor. This reduction can only be brought about by a considerable reduction of the Army and Navy, and if done it will be in the face of the opposition of the President and the heads of these two departments. I hope it will be done. If it is done, let not the administration hereafter claim credit for it as an evidence of its economy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is one of many general deficiency bills. The bill is properly named, as old General Incompetency and old General Deficiency are in full and supreme command of the disorganized legions of the Autocratic, falsely called the Republican, Party. [Laughter.] It is not my purpose to discuss the many appropriations contained in the bill, because not being a member of the Committee on Appropriations I am not sufficiently conversant with its provisions at present to properly do so.

The mighty cyclone from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] has swept across this Chamber in an herculean effort to crush and demolish the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA]. Vast physical energy was expended and a mighty explosion occurred as if the heavens were being rent asunder, but the storm died away in the distance, a harmless noise, and did not leave ruin and devastation in its wake as is usual with Kansas cyclones, nor were the tables in front of the Speaker's stand demolished by the terrific concussion. The gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA] still survives, and I presume the Island of Porto Rico, beautiful gem of the ocean, kissed by an ardent southern sun and fanned by soft and genial winds wafted over summer seas, is intact, undisturbed, and uninjured.

I also notice that the politically evasive and slippery gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] opened the campaign for the next congressional election, and also his own campaign for United States Senator from Ohio, by entering a stirring plea of confession and avoidance for the many and grievous sins of omission and commission attributed to his, the autocratic, miscalled Republican, Party. [Laughter.]

Not long since in this Chamber I made a few remarks about the manner in which the autocratic party is conducting the administration of the civil-service laws in the appointment of postmasters, but the gentleman was very silent on that subject in his panegyric on the accomplishments of his party, and I believe for the reason that when the Democrats are in power he is in favor of a strict enforcement of civil-service laws, but when the Republicans are in charge he is violently opposed to their enforcement except on the recommendation of Republican political organizations.

Not long since I made a few remarks in this House in regard to civil-service laws as administered by the autocratic party now in power, and those remarks, it appears, punctured the epidermis of the Civil Service Commission, the Post Office Department, and the entire administration.

The president of the Civil Service Commission, John H. Bartlett, in reply thereto, wrote a letter addressed to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], which that gentleman had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of recent date, and Mr. Bartlett also sent me a copy of the letter. I answered the letter of Mr. Bartlett, and that answer is as follows:

DEAR SIR: I received a copy of your letter written to Hon. FREDERICK R. LEHLBACH in criticism of remarks made by me recently in the House in regard to violations of the civil service laws by the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission. I would have replied sooner to your letter had not other and more important matters intervened.

Your letter is a weak plea of confession and avoidance. You appear to be not only a representative of the Civil Service Commission, but seem to have been appointed minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to plead the cause of your commission, the Post Office Department, and the administration generally against the charge of having violated the civil service laws in the appointment of postmasters.

I have no doubt whatever but what the entire administration, from that valiant Christian soldier and greatest living statesman, the President, who seems quite handy with pen in signing Executive orders depriving ex-service men of appointments as postmasters, down to the very messenger boys, are uproariously in favor of a strict enforcement of civil service laws—in theory—but are enthusiastically opposed to the enforcement of such laws especially where an ex-soldier, regardless of his politics, can by an Executive order be displaced by an organization Republican.

The first complaint you make is that my statement that the private secretary of Dr. Work requested of A. P. Richards, connected with the Civil Service Commission, when returning a list of eligibles, that he would like to have a certain person on the list and "see if you can not revise the list so as to include our friends."

You state that the above is wholly unfounded and is denied by Mr. Richards though you are silent as to what Dr. Work's secretary has to say about the matter.

The information that the above conversation took place was given to me by a reputable gentleman in the House Office Building who has no interest in the matter, and who says he heard the conversation, and after seeing your letter affirms his statement is true. I believe fully that my informant stated the truth. He has no interest to serve that would induce him to speak otherwise than truthfully concerning the conversation. Richards is an interested witness and knows full well that should he admit the conversation took place he would be in danger of official decapitation.

You state, in substance, in your letter that there is not any working agreement between the Post Office Department and the commission as to the appointments of postmasters. I think the evidence conclusively shows otherwise. In addition to the above cited conversation with Richards, Dr. Work, First Assistant Postmaster General, on August 31, 1921, wrote your commission as follows in regard to the appointment of a postmaster at Goldsboro, N. C.:

"In view of the experience of Mr. Simkins and the fact that he is strongly recommended locally for this position the department desires to nominate him for the position of postmaster."

I am informed by Mr. Brinson, Member of Congress from North Carolina, that he saw a letter in the files of the Civil Service Commission relating to the appointment of a postmaster at Goldsboro, and that he copied certain parts of the letter. He states in that letter Dr. Work requested the commission to arrange the civil-service status of Simkins so that he can be appointed. The date of this letter is August 31, 1921. I suppose by this time it would be as difficult to have that letter produced as to find a needle in a haystack.

Simkins was later appointed postmaster at Goldsboro, and the appointment was made by the handy pen of the President restoring him to a civil-service status by the easy road of an Executive order, and that after a letter written June 24, 1921, by Dr. Work to a minister of the gospel at Goldsboro pledging his word that he would request the Civil Service Commission to hold an examination for postmaster at that place. The Post Office Department expressed by letter to the Civil Service Commission its desire to nominate Simkins for postmaster, and, instead of an examination, as Dr. Work stated there would be, it was arranged to have him appointed by Executive order without any examination being held. In view of these facts when you say there is no working agreement between the department and the commission I reply, I believe your statement is unfounded.

Your statement that eligibles are certified on their merit wholly is not correct unless you consider incompetency in a civil service position and inefficiency in military service the best evidence of merit in a chairman of a Republican committee, as in the Simkins case.

The above instances show beyond the shadow of any doubt that there is a tacit understanding between the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission as to who shall be selected for appointment as postmasters, at least in many instances.

You complain that in the letter of Dr. Work of August 31, 1921, about the Simkins appointment I inserted the following: "By the Republican county committee, of course, of which Simkins was chairman."

You intimate the insertion was made to mislead the public to believe that it was the language used by Dr. Work. The insertion was in brackets, as the printed remarks made by me in the House show and as your letter to Mr. LEHLBACH shows. You evidently do not understand the purpose of brackets inclosing a word or sentence in a letter or speech. Had you consulted a dictionary you would have discovered that brackets are hooks used to inclose an explanation or a part to be excluded from a sentence and to indicate an interpolation, and that an interpolation is a word or passage inserted in the writing of another. I presumed when I made the remark that every person possessed of even an ordinary education would understand the use of such brackets without being furnished a definition or diagram to explain the purpose of their use, and that the language was inserted as mine and no part of Dr. Work's letter. Possibly it might be advisable for you to purchase a dictionary and consult some of its contents before you again indulge in the gentle pastime of letter writing.

Simkins, who was appointed postmaster at Goldsboro, was demoted from the position of assistant postmaster to that of clerk at a less salary because of inefficiency, and this demotion was made on recommendation of a post office inspector who further stated in his report that Simkins did not have sufficient interest in the work done and would not cooperate with the postmaster in the work to be done. This statement you do not controvert, but say he was reinstated in the service before promotion—when he was demoted, not promoted—and was absent on military leave from August 8, 1916, but until when you do not say.

The facts are that Simkins was in military service but was discharged from the service for inefficiency, and he had been demoted in civil service for the same cause, both of which were known to you or could have easily been ascertained before he was appointed postmaster.

As for Simkins's military record, L. E. Brasher, of Goldsboro, N. C., an officer in the Army under Simkins, wrote a letter dated August 18, 1921, to Congressman BRINSON, in which he says:

"Maj. Simkins as a soldier was a miserable failure. He was discharged from the Army for inefficiency, and it was a well-known fact among the officers, and even the enlisted men, of his battalion that he was incapable of commanding troops. This opinion was borne out by both the division commander, Brig. Gen. S. L. Faison, and the regimental commander, Col. J. Van B. Metts, when they accepted his resignation and ordered his discharge. To my own personal knowledge he was the laughingstock of the whole battalion, both officers and men, not as a man but as a soldier.

"I have no personal animosity toward Maj. Simkins, but I do not propose to sit idle without protest and see him or any other near soldier receive preference at the hands of the Government on account of his war record when he had no war record. His war record, as can readily be ascertained by reference to the files in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army, is 'nil.'"

So Simkins was appointed by Executive order without examination after Dr. Work has expressed a desire to the commission that he be nominated, in face of the fact that Simkins was inefficient in civil affairs and incompetent in military service, which was well known to you or could have been by investigation. And it is a fact, which you do not deny, that Simkins was chairman of the local Republican committee, and the local recommendation alluded to by Dr. Work was that of the Republican organization, and because of that I believe the Executive order for his appointment was obtained without regard to the civil service laws.

You state that in the case of the Bowling Green, Ky., post office a certification has been made to the Post Office Department and no review of the case has been asked for. An examination for postmaster at Bowling Green was held on August 9, 1921, but no certification was made until February 4, 1922. I now request a rerating of the examination papers for that office. Bowling Green is a first-class office in a town of 10,000 inhabitants, and business training and experience is rated in examinations for postmasters at 50 per cent, and all other subjects together at 50 per cent. I request you to furnish the ratings separately on each, and all the papers of each and every candidate who took the last examination for that office. I have reason to believe that the present postmaster stood first on all subjects, that her business rating was lowered so as to keep her off the register of eligibles. She is highly recommended, and before her appointment as postmaster was a teacher in the high school, almost worshiped by her pupils, stood high in the community, made an excellent postmaster, and I believe a person of fine business qualifications, in view of the fact that I was personally informed by a gentleman of the Civil Service Commission that her record as postmaster "is well near perfect."

In my opinion the reason for not appointing a postmaster at Bowling Green is because the local Republicans are in a row among themselves and the department is awaiting the indorsement of the Republican committee. If that statement is not correct, why is the appointment of a postmaster at that place delayed by the department? Has the department not known for some time who are on the eligible list?

If all that is permissible under the law is given to ex-service men, why has not Dr. Bushong, an ex-soldier, been appointed postmaster at Edmonton, Ky.? He is a Republican, a gentleman, and a man of splendid reputation. The examination for postmaster at Edmonton was held October 22, 1921, and the then postmaster made the highest average, as was shown by the certification dated January 30, 1922. After the certification the postmaster was removed on charges which I believe to be untrue, and his name was also removed from the register of eligibles. It is quite a suspicious circumstance that the department did not remove him until some one, evidently at Edmonton, found he was at the head of the eligible list, and filed charges against him for the purpose of having him removed from the list. But the question is, Why is not the ex-soldier, Capt. Bushong, appointed? He is listed as the only preference eligible on the certified list submitted to me by the department and is entitled to first consideration.

At Moorehead City, N. C., A. B. Morris, an ex-soldier, stood first on the certified list, but C. L. Willis, who is not an ex-soldier, was appointed postmaster. My information from a Member of Congress from North Carolina is that Willis is an active local Republican politician and does not command the very highest respect in the community.

At Princeton, N. C., C. Holt, an ex-soldier, stood first on the certified list. E. F. Pearce, who is not an ex-soldier, was appointed.

At Black Mountain, N. C., Howard A. Kerlee, an ex-soldier, stood first on the certified list, but Amelia B. Stepp was appointed postmaster.

At Clyde, N. C., V. H. Byers, an ex-soldier, stood first on the certified list, but J. N. Stark, third on the certified list and not an ex-soldier, was appointed.

At Culberson, N. C., F. M. Johnson, an ex-soldier, stood first on the certified list, but James W. Hyatt, third on the list and not an ex-soldier, was appointed.

At Lake Junaluska, N. C., Miss Emma D. White, who was the only eligible, was not certified, but another examination was ordered at the instance of the Republican committee.

At Weaverville, N. C., Miss Reagan, who was postmaster at the time, took the examination and stood first on the register of eligibles, but on recommendation of the Republican organization L. H. Michael was appointed. Miss Reagan is a maiden lady and the sole support of her brother's two orphan children.

At Andrews, N. C., Clyde H. Jarrett and Miss Pearl Parker took the examination. Jarrett refused the appointment as postmaster at that place because of his election as mayor. Miss Parker's nomination was then sent to the Senate and her appointment confirmed. The eligible list for that post office was certified May 22, 1920. The nomination of Jarrett was again sent to the Senate September 29, 1921, a little more than 16 months after the list had been certified. Under the law Jarrett's eligibility had expired more than four months before his nomination. Yet Jarrett was restored to the eligible list either by Executive order or under the order of May 10, 1921, or by another examination being ordered, and Miss Parker was removed from office.

Miss Parker made a splendid record as postmaster and was recommended, so I am informed, by most of the patrons of the office, and in addition she is a cripple and needed the salary of the office for her support. The Congressman from that district was informed by the department that appointments of postmasters in North Carolina would be made on the recommendation of John M. Morehead, Republican national committeeman and Republican political "boss" of that State.

I do not hold any brief for the State of North Carolina and do not in any way represent that State, but these are some cases which have been cited to me by Members of Congress from North Carolina, and there are many others in various parts of the country.

The ex-service men named in this letter who have been rejected by the department, or their appointments held up, number eight, and they embrace only three congressional districts. If the ex-service men have been rejected or their appointments held up at the same rate in every congressional district the ex-soldiers so rejected number nearly 900. Six who stood first on the certified lists have absolutely been rejected in three districts and persons who had no military service have received the appointments. If this rate of rejection of ex-soldiers who stood first on the eligible list has been kept up the number rejected amounts to at least 600, excluding the districts in the large cities where no postmasters are appointed.

Of course, your statement that all ex-service men are given all that is permissible on their merit is not correct. It will be difficult for you to induce the public, in view of the record of the Post Office Department, to believe the correctness of that statement.

In the district which I represent a Republican newspaper recently made the statement that a certain person was the only applicant for postmaster at a certain town; that she had been indorsed by the Republican county organization; and that no one else would be an applicant for postmaster. It has come to be understood, by Republicans at least, in some parts of my district that civil service laws are suspended by this administration and all that is needed to land a post-office appointment is the indorsement of the local Republican organization and that of the Republican Senator from that State.

In remarks in the House of Representatives February 20, 1922, made by Hon. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois, former Republican leader in the House of Representatives, he stated:

"Oh, the Postmaster General has not been worth a 5-cent piece since he has been Postmaster General. He does not know anything about the Post Office Department; and, for one, I am mighty glad he is getting out of it. His only object has been to be extravagant in his own personal relations with the Government. Long-distance telephoning is his main long suit."

In my opinion, Mr. MANN might have extended his remarks and truthfully applied them to the entire Post Office Department, and the Civil Service Commission, included.

I believe the commission and the Post Office Department have violated both the spirit and letter of the civil service laws.

Power brings responsibility. The Republican Party is in power and should legally fill the offices with good and competent persons. It should repeal the civil service laws in regard to post offices and rural-route carriers at least, and then in the light of day appoint competent and reputable Republicans to those positions. This administration should not violate the spirit of the law every day in making these appointments under the false pretense that it is complying with the law. You declare that the law is complied with. I say it is not, and I have shown that it is not. You state in substance that it is your intention to comply with the law. I hope that is true. Maybe under the lash of public opinion the administration will come to its senses in the matter of civil-service reform and not use the law as a shield to cover its evasions of the law. I hope reformation will come under this administration, but I, for one, do not look for it. There is an old saying that—

"As long as the lamp of life holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return."

And I trust that some time in a not far-distant day the administration will see the light and comply with the law, and not use it as a mantle to cover hypocrisy.

Mr. MONDELL, of Wyoming, as well as Dr. FESS, of Ohio, and other misinformed but enthusiastic gentlemen of the autocratic party, have from time to time made many and illusive and, as they appear to me, Munchausen statements concerning the legislative accomplishments of the grand old autocratic party, some of which alleged enactments at a future day and more convenient season—provided I can obtain time to do so—I propose to review.

The autocratic party, before the last presidential election, was, as is customary with that party, prolific with promises; but since the election, and the necessity, for the present, has passed, it has been noted chiefly for the paucity of its performances. To-day, however, Dr. FESS, for the purposes of the approaching congressional election and his own candidacy for the United States Senate, reviews his party's unpaid promissory note of unfulfilled pledges by promising more promises which he ought to know will never be paid, but will be forgotten as soon as the election is over, until another election approaches when the never-to-be-paid promissory note of promises will be again renewed.

The activities of this administration remind me of an anecdote of a Negro preacher who was possessed of good, common, and what is usually known as "hoss" sense. The men of his congregation did not attend church in warm weather, but all crowded around the stove in cold weather and warmed their hands and toasted their shins and got "ligion." This preacher in addressing his congregation said:

I knows you men. You come here in the winter and set by de stove and warms your hands and toasts your shins and all get religious, but when summer time comes and it gets warm you all loaf on de park benches and wear out the seats of your britches backsliding.

[Laughter.]

That is the condition of the autocratic party represented by Mr. MONDELL and Dr. FESS and others of that type. They all get political religion just before every election, become powerfully pious politically, and fill the air with doleful lamentations because of the sinfulness of the unregenerate Democrats, and are profuse in promises of Republican prosperity, but after the election they all fall from grace, if any of them ever really had any grace, which I doubt, and wear out the seats of their pants backsliding from preelection promises. [Applause.]

Dr. FESS spoke vehemently and learnedly about the prosperity that is now about to overtake the farmers, when it is a well-known fact that the prices of agricultural products are below the cost of production and the farmers of Kansas, Nebraska, and parts of the Northwest have been burning corn for fuel, so low has been the price of corn. He states that the price of corn is now some sixty-odd cents per bushel in Chicago. That may be true, but at gathering time and when the farmers were compelled to sell in those regions I have mentioned corn sold for from 10 to 20 cents a bushel and was a drug on the market even at those prices. There is a gentleman, now an employee in this Chamber, who two months ago was offered a carload of corn shelled and to be delivered on board the car at 20 cents a bushel in the spring, and yet the gentleman from Ohio, Dr. FESS, has the temerity to talk about the prosperity of the farmer. A few more years of such Republican prosperity and most of them will be bankrupt and homeless. Under Republican management corn got to be 60 cents a bushel in the Chicago pits under the control of profiteers, after the farmers had been compelled to sell for from 10 to 20 cents a bushel, and that is the Republican idea of prosperity.

Corn was burned for fuel under the administration of Harrison, and now the same thing is happening under this administration, and there has never been a financial panic since the Civil War in this Republic but what had its inception during a Republican administration and the panic-breeding legislation passed by that party. Through its manipulation of the Federal reserve law it has deflated the currency and brought untold hardship and financial embarrassment to business all over the country.

Strange, too, Dr. FESS boasted about what his party had done for good roads, and seemed to me to try to leave the impression that all that had been done in that direction was the work of his party, and that it was entitled to special commendation for its valuable efforts in that direction. The facts are that the Republican Party through its long years of mismanagement of public affairs resisted and defeated every proposition to enact a good roads law, and that law was passed by the Democratic Party under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson.

Since the last advent of the Republican Party into power the appropriations for good roads has been reduced $25,000,000 below the Democratic appropriations for that purpose, and the Republican Party even delayed that appropriation and thereby crippled and retarded the building of better roads. Possibly this reduction of $25,000,000 was made in order that there might be more money available for a ship subsidy and a gift to the railroads.

The last Republican platform was abundant in promises about what it would do for the cause of labor and led the laboring man to believe that under a Republican administration his wages would be greatly increased, and he would be contented and prosperous and as happy as a maiden with a bouquet of roses that bloom in the lovely month of May. Those prospects have been swept aside like shifting sand on the seashore and from 4,000,000 to 6,000,000 laboring people are out of employment, half of them not knowing where the next meal is to come from and most of them who are spending any money to speak of are using what they had left over from work done during Wilson's administration.

It is difficult now to find a laboring man who will admit he voted for Harding, and most of those who admit it are ashamed of it, and declare they will never be guilty again. In Ohio, in the Hocking Valley, in the President's own State, coal miners have not averaged much over 50 days' work in a year and are suffering for the barest necessities of life, and many of them are at the point of starvation.

It is reasonable to presume that a Cabinet officer reflects the opinions and sentiments of the President. Mr. Weeks, Secretary of War, in the fall of 1921, in an interview with W. C. Hushing, in Weeks's office at the War Department, in the presence of several other persons, made the following statement in regard to labor and conditions in the Panama Canal Zone:

American labor must be liquidated. American workmen's wages are six times what European workmen get; and until such time as American wages are put on a parity with those of the European workmen it will be impossible for the United States to get back to normal conditions.

Mr. Hushing made affidavit, sworn and subscribed to before a notary public, as to the truth of this statement. Mr. Hushing is a refined-looking, intelligent gentleman, who is in the city, and may be found at the Harrington Hotel. And so, according to this administration, which promised so much to labor before the election, Republican normalcy seems to be in favor of reducing the wages of labor five times lower than they are now and placing the wages of American labor on a parity with that of European labor.

While in Panama last December Mr. Hushing and several other gentlemen called on me at the hotel where I was stopping with a request to talk over conditions in the Canal Zone. I had never seen nor heard of Mr. Hushing or any of the gentlemen who accompanied him. During the conversation Mr. Hushing discussed an interview he had with the President when the President visited Panama during the interval between his election and inauguration. Mr. Hushing stated that the President said in that interview that—he was opposed to the scheme of excess-profit taxes in vogue, and that he and some of his colleagues had devised a system of direct-sales tax which was the proper system of taxation, but that they realized that this tax would be so unpopular with the public that they did not have the courage to present that scheme to the public.

Mr. Hushing asked the President, during that interview, if he was in favor of collective bargaining, and the President replied that "he was, provided the leaders were sane." Mr. Hushing says he thought at the time the President meant he was in favor of collective bargaining if the people who desired collective bargaining and sale would knuckle to officials who were in charge without question. Mr. Hushing also made affidavit of the truth of this conversation with the President.

The Republican Party has made many and divers promises concerning the soldiers' bonus. The administration, including the President and Congress, have all been flopping around like a lot of chickens with their heads cut off trying to devise some plan of bonus to catch the vote of both the soldiers and the profiteers. The President appeared before the Senate in opposition to the bonus passed by the House, and recently a representative of the American Legion, who is in favor of a bonus, emerged from the White House after an interview with the President on that subject, and stated, in substance, that all is well and he is perfectly satisfied with the President's position. The President seems to me to be the blue-ribbon wiggler and wobbler of the age. The report is in circulation that the Committee on Ways and Means has determined to bring in a bonus bill which provides certificates of indebtedness to the soldiers payable in three years. By that scheme, if the soldiers realize any benefit from the bonus in the next three years, they will be compelled to sell the certificates at a large discount to the banks and people who discount such paper, and in the long run the soldiers will not realize much more than half of what is due them, because the majority are compelled to have currency to tide them over the hard times and unemployment brought about by this administration. By that scheme the soldiers will get some money and the bankers and loan sharks will make great profits. By that scheme the Republican Party hopes to corral the votes of the soldiers, the bankers, and loan sharks.

I commend to the consideration of Mr. MONDELL, Dr. FESS, and other Republican leaders the following, which fits the case better than anything I can say:

Harding is now my shepherd, and I am in want,
He maketh me to lie down on park benches,
He leadeth me beside the free soup houses,
He restoreth my doubt in the Republican Party.
He leadeth me in the path of destitution for his party's sake,
Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of starvation,
I do fear evil, for thou art against me,
Thy policies and the profiteers they frighten me.
Thou prepareth a reduction in wages before me in the presence of mine enemies,
Thou annointest my income with taxes, my expenses runneth over my income.
Surely poverty and unemployment will follow me all the days of this normalcy administration,
And I will dwell in a rented house forever.

Like the guests bidden to the rich man's feast, the Republican leaders all with one consent make excuse for broken promises, financial distress, and depressing conditions. They vainly boast of doing things they have not done. Like the Pharisees of old, "they make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments" and love the uppermost rooms at the feasts of the profiteers and the chief seats in the Temple of Mammon, and at the same time "they bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders, but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers."

The administration called a disarmament conference which it contends is the first and greatest achievement along that line ever attempted in the history of the world, when as a matter of fact the dream and effort of the ages has ever been to find a pathway to peace and disarmament, as is evidenced by the Holy Alliance and The Hague Conference, and other associations, while William Jennings Bryan has devoted half of a lifetime to efforts of that kind. The Harding disarmament conference resulted in the formation of a farcical four-power bush league in which the United States surrendered most all our rights in the Pacific Ocean and agrees to withdraw our frontier defenses from the Philippine Islands to Hawaii, and about all we get in return is a practically useless cable station in the island of Yap controlled by Japan, while our civilization has been disarmed in the Pacific for the benefit of the brown races, and the President is pronounced by the Republican press and leaders of his party as the greatest living statesman.

Another Republican achievement in incubation which I have heretofore mentioned is a ship subsidy bill to further enrich the Shipping Trust at the expense of the taxpayers. In a word, the provisions of that bill really mean the Government will take the assets from one department for the purpose of a ship subsidy and transfer them to another department and claim it has reduced taxation, and then take the same assets and retransfer them to the same department from which they were first transferred and again claim in the name of economy it has further reduced taxation when it has only transferred and retransferred the same assets, and the taxpayers will have to bear the burden of taxation for the private benefit of a private Shipping Trust.

The administration robs Peter to pay Paul, and then robs Paul to repay Peter, and calls that remarkable achievement economy and a reduction of taxation. The Republican Congress for three years has been floundering aimlessly in the deep waters of tariff revision, and the tariff bill is still in the Republican incubator and will finally result not in fine Republican spring chickens but in addled and useless eggs. Meanwhile business is distressed, our exports have fallen off two-thirds, and bankruptcy proceedings are alarmingly frequent in business circles. In New York City alone 50 concerns within 10 weeks have suspended operations or gone into bankruptcy under conditions of Republican normalcy. The Republican Party promised many things in its tortuous journey toward normalcy and has accomplished practically nothing.

Like the devil on the mount when he tempted Jesus by offering Him all the kingdoms of the world if He would fall down and worship him, the Republican Party tempts all the people of this land to vote the Republican ticket by promising them all sorts of impossible things which it knows it will never deliver, and, like the devil, does not possess the things it promises.

Again reverting to violations of the civil service laws, no doubt the commission will claim that my letter contains a parenthesis. But that is not correct. It contained an interpolation, as was shown by the insertion being inclosed by hooks or brackets, which is the recognized way of denoting an interpolation, and to contend anything else is merely to beg the question and evade the facts.

No doubt the commission is weeping briny tears over the charges against the persecuted and patriotic organization Republican Committeeman Simkins and will assert that gross injustice has been done that shining light of efficiency. Perhaps the commission will contend that I personally have made charges of inefficiency and incompetency against that individual, but the charges were first made by a Post Office inspector and by L. E. Brasher, an officer who served in the Army under Simkins, in a letter to Congressman BRINSON, and the charge of military inefficiency contained in that letter was fully corroborated by Gen. Faison and Col. Van Metts. Men frequently resign positions on account of pressure, or their resignation is requested for the good of the service, and the question is, Why did Simkins resign and his discharge ordered in time of war, when no resignations were being accepted except for justifiable reasons? Probably the commission will also contend he was reinstated in the civil service after military service because of military preference. The civil-service laws do not provide, in my opinion, for the reinstatement of a military officer in civil service because of military preference, when that officer was demoted in civil-service rank because of incompetency, and resigned from the Army in time of war because of inefficiency, and perhaps under pressure. In my opinion, he was reinstated in civil service not because of military service but because he was chairman of a Republican organization and a valuable asset to the party in that capacity. I do not charge Simkins with being a near soldier. That charge is made in the letter of Mr. Brasher to Congressman BRINSON, and it appears to me from the charge made in that letter that Simkins is scarcely entitled to the appellation of even a "near soldier."

The commission will, perhaps, say that I have criticized the President, and that I do not deny, although I know to do so is lese majeste in Republican opinion, for that party believes a Republican king can do no wrong.

Perhaps the commission will contend that a postmaster who is a school-teacher and has not had three years' business experience is not eligible for appointment. I do not know what the commission calls business experience. It may be in its opinion the highest business experience in an applicant for postmaster is qualification to actively and effectively direct a Republican organization in a political campaign. The postmaster at Bowling Green, Ky., has had years of experience in the large high school at Bowling Green and in addition over two years' experience as postmaster at Bowling Green, and her record in that position is "well near perfect" and yet she is considered by the commission without business experience.

The commission may contend that the statement of Congressman MANN is not within its jurisdiction, but that statement is within the jurisdiction of the people of all political parties and will be branded and burned into the mind of the public.

Perhaps the commission will offer as an excuse for its treatment of ex-soldiers the statement that they are without business experience and therefore are incompetent for appointment as postmasters. It does not take much of so-called business experience to qualify a person to act as a third or fourth class postmaster, and business experience, in my opinion, is used only as a subterfuge to turn down competent applicants who are not desirable to the commission and the Post Office Department.

According to Mr. MANN, the recent Postmaster General knows nothing about the Post Office Department. If Mr. MANN's statement is correct, and I believe it is, the administration has had as its Postmaster General a person who has not sufficient business experience in that line to be worth a 5-cent piece in that capacity, and yet ex-soldiers are turned away from appointments as postmasters because of alleged lack of business experience, while, at least in some instances, war slackers are appointed because they happen to be connected with Republican organizations, as in the case of Simkins. No reason has ever been given by the commission why Simkins resigned his commission in the Army in time of war, and his resignation was promptly accepted by his commanding officer when men were being drafted into the Army and resignations were not accepted without good and sufficient reason.

In the letter inserted addressed to the president of the Civil Service Commission I stated, in substance, that a lifetime had been fixed in which the vilest sinner may repent and return to ways of righteousness, and perhaps the commission will say that applies to me. That may be true. I admit my many shortcomings, but they have never been so frequent nor so grievous as to qualify me for membership on the Civil Service Commission.

The commission contends that it has no jurisdiction over the appointment of postmasters after it has certified a list of eligibles to the Post Office Department, but I have fully shown by competent evidence there is an understanding as to whom shall be certifiel by the commission. This is evidenced by the letter of Dr. Work to the commission dated August 31, 1921, in which among other things in regard to the Simkins appointment, he states, "the department desires to nominate him for the position of postmaster." Why this desire, and the request to the commission, if there is no working understanding between the department and the commission? What right under the law has the Post Office Department to inform the commission of its desire to nominate any person for postmaster? The thing is too patent to be argued. To cap the climax, Simkins was nominated and appointed postmaster, and was reinstated in civil service for that purpose, notwithstanding his former civil-service incompetency and his military inefficiency. I have stated other and abundant evidence of the understanding between the commission and the department.

The people are aroused and times will change. As education advances among the masses, beaurocratic republicanism, with all its violations of law, will be laid away in a soon-to-be-forgotten grave. Democracy, which is the foundation stone of liberty and progress, will prevail in the administration of the affairs of this Republic, the birds will sing sweeter, the flowers will bloom lovelier, and the sun will shine brighter in the old Kentucky home and all over this goodly land. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, Wall Street, New York, and State Street, Boston, are one and the same thing. The veterans of the World War should understand this, for it will clear up many clouds.

In New York the money jugglers and stock-kiters of high and low degree do business on Wall Street; in Boston, State Street is the market place.

New York's money market has its own newspaper—the Wall Street Journal. Here is what the Wall Street Journal says of the bonus:

> The soldiers' bonus is indefensible. The claim is based on a special service never performed. Every citizen is implicitly a defender of his country. If performance of that duty entails the risk of war, so much the worse for him. If it entails disablement, the duty of the other citizens is plain. They must take care of him, just as they must provide for a policeman injured in discharge of his duty. But the responsibility stops here. The able-bodied men who served have no other claim than the terms of their contract.
> The soldiers' bonus in any form contemplated is a levy of political blackmail which will only be the first of many such demands. Payment at this time would set back the business of the country to such extent as to insure wide unemployment for years to come. The lump sum would soon be spent, and would merely whet the appetite for more. Every popularity-hunting politician would be as ready to raise a demand for a new bonus as he would be to introduce a pension bill to oblige a constituent. If once the principle is conceded, there is no end to the demand. The man who once pays blackmail pays it until he is exhausted.

Of course Wall Street is a liar and a faker, but its opinion will be quoted by every pinhead in the country. Even in remote villages you will find some tight-fisted old curmudgeon, who wants to rob widows and orphans, arguing against the bonus. He will tell you just what Wall Street tells you.

The so-called "leading business men" of many communities, who usually are agents for some one else, errand boys for some combination or trust, will also recite the Wall Street prayer.

When Wall Street was kiting foreign loans and wanted the bodies of American boys to protect those loans, when Wall Street feared the loss of her dollars invested in shipping, then the boy in uniform was a hero. He is a "blackmailer" to-day.

If he went to war, "so much the worse for him," says Wall Street. But that was not said when war was on. He was the best man then.

"The soldiers' bonus in any form is political blackmail," says Wall Street, forgetting the blackmail of millions for looted railroads, fake war finance corporations, burlesque shipyards which never built ships, and sponge-cake ships which never sailed the seas.

"Payment would set back the business of the country," says Wall Street, forgetting that Wall Street and State Street have ruined business by taking away their money and investing it in nontaxable securities.

The veteran who votes for, talks for, or supports Wall Street or State Street deserves to be called a "blackmailer."

The Chamber of Commerce in Kiwash and the Board of Trade in Washki have passed solemn resolutions against the bonus for World War veterans; the associated brokers and the amalgamated builders have informed the Congress that the bonus would threaten the Nation; and every tank town money lender and every war profiteer and every rent hog and food shark is in the procession of protestants.

The World War veteran should realize now just where he fits in national estimation. Outside of his family circle, he is recognized as a thug ready to loot the Treasury. He is being accused of putting a price upon his patriotism, but those who accuse him had a chance to put a value upon their own and they valued it so high that the Government, in a day of war, could not bid enough to secure their services in uniform.

The thieves and rogues, the fools who join any yelping pack when the pack appears to have treed a victim, are shouting against the bonus, and men who know better and men who know that the opposition is based upon lies are doing nothing to make the truth known.

Every newspaper tied to the financial interests is attacking the bonus, proving to every fair-minded man and woman that a "free" press, so familiar in poetic theory, is a rarity in fact.

It is laughable to read the protests against the soldiers' bonus. Every fake moralist, every lying reformer, is jumping upon a soap box to attack the veteran. Even the national commander of the American Legion, a man whose character and standing are above reproach, is assailed as if he were a second-story worker.

Will the veterans learn by this antibonus agitation?

Will they look beneath the surface for the cause?

Will they understand that until they all get together in one big unit and forget their factions and their prejudices they will be the victims of those who despise them?

With their votes and the votes of their relatives, votes which hold the balance of power in the Nation, they can punish those who victimize them, but they can not employ their votes until they unite and present an unbroken front to their enemies.

Mr. Chairman, what I have just said to this House, while it is in absolute accord with my own feelings on this bonus proposition, is not my language, and I want the House to know it. It is the splendid contribution of a leading Boston editor at a time when it is most needed to help stiffen up some Congressmen from my own State who might be weakening at the knees.

Mr. Neil P. Moynihan, the fearless editor of the Boston Telegram, is the author of this language, and it is so everlastingly truthful that I feel it my duty to repeat his language here in the House, where perhaps it will have its effect. We have waited for months for action on this bill, and Wall Street and State Street for months have blocked its passage. This Boston editor tells the truth, the whole truth, and I sincerely hope that the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means will carefully read what I have said, quoting this brilliant champion, and pay quick heed to his words.

Oh, for a few more real editors like this one, who cares naught for State Street threats and less for Wall Street favors! He is the champion of real champions, and I doff my hat to him and his dare-to-do daily paper. More power to him and his remarkable pen! [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA].

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, I know that Gov. Reily is an enemy of truth and a man who is always ready to attribute improper motives to people who attack him, but I did not think it possible that he could secure the assistance of a Member of this House, who would accept his false statements of facts to malign the character and integrity of another Member of this body. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] says that Gov. Reily vetoed a bill appropriating $20,000 to be paid to me out of the Porto Rican treasury. This ought to be a matter of record; and I challenge the gentleman to produce the record and to produce it here if it is true. No such bill was ever presented to Gov. Reily for his approval or disapproval. I will explain to you the truth of the matter. Three years and a half ago the Legislature of Porto Rico appropriated $5,000 for the Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico in Washington. Immediately after the bill carrying this appropriation was passed I published a letter in the newspapers in Porto Rico declining to accept the appropriation. That letter has been published. The next year the legislature made the same appropriation. The matter was brought to the attention of the auditor of Porto Rico, Judge Bonner, without my knowledge, and this man, whom I recommended for reappointment to President Wilson but whom Gov. Reily caused to be removed, held that the appropriation was unconstitutional, because as a Member of this body my salary could not be increased, assuming that the appropriation constituted an increase of that salary. I recommended Judge Bonner to President Wilson for the position of auditor, and I did something more for him.

When Gov. Reily tried to remove him, I went to the Secretary of War and to Gen. McIntyre and opposed his removal, in spite of his decision, to which I have just referred, stating that he was one of the most able men in Porto Rico. When Gov. Reily came with this story to the Secretary of War and to Gen. McIntyre, he was told that this was a happening of two or three years ago, and that Judge Bonner was subsequently recommended for reappointment as auditor of Porto Rico by me.

Gentlemen, this matter of the appropriation occurred before Reily reached Porto Rico; nor has he had any intervention in any legislation since his appointment. When he says that it was stopped when brought to his attention I am compelled to say that he lies, and that he knows he lies. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] says that he is my friend. I expect that some day in the future he will regret the accusation he made to-day, because I believe he is an honest and sincere man, and an honest and a sincere man is compelled to regret a false accusation against the honesty and integrity of another.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has referred to Judge Bonner, the former auditor of Porto Rico. I take this occasion to say that I have known Judge Bonner for years. He sat on the circuit bench in my own city. There is not a more competent or more capable man or a man of higher character anywhere in the world than Judge Bonner. His record as auditor met with the entire satisfaction of everybody and resulted in the saving of thousands of dollars to the people of Porto Rico.

Mr. DAVILA. He was one of the most honest and clean men I have ever known in my life. I want to say of the governor of Porto Rico that when I went there I was friendly to him. It was my duty to give full cooperation to Gov. Reily. He made his inaugural address. It was very tactless, but I continued to try to support him, notwithstanding adverse public opinion. But when Gov. Reily wrote that letter to the president of the Porto Rican Senate, practically insulting him, then we came to a parting of the ways, and I immediately sailed for Washington. On arrival here I called on the President and Secretary of War. I told President Harding that I was afraid Gov. Reily was making a mistake in his policy, and I asked the President to please write to the governor of Porto Rico to change his attitude toward my people. I also went to see the Secretary of War, and I said the same thing to him. I still tried to be friendly to the governor although he was hostile to me, because I came here and said to President Harding and the Secretary of War that he was committing a blunder. I am not a personal enemy of Gov. Reily, but I am opposed to his continuance in office on account of his unfitness. When I was in the island the governor offered to recommend me for a position on the supreme court upon the resignation of the chief justice of Porto Rico.

I declined to accept the position. Gen. McIntyre also spoke to me about a position on the supreme court. I told him, "General, I am now attacking Gov. Reily. If the President gave me the position as chief justice of the supreme court, my people would think that I had surrendered for a position in the government, and I will never do that." I declined to accept the position as justice of the supreme court. Everybody knows my record in Porto Rico. I have no money, but I have the richness of my honesty and of my integrity, and there is not a man in the world who can say that my integrity is assailable. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to get this $5,000 understanding straight. If I got the gentleman's statement, it is that at one time the Porto Rico Legislature appropriated $5,000 additional for salary of the gentleman from Porto Rico and he declined it?

Mr. DAVILA. It was not additional salary, but intended as an expense account. But I want to make this point clear. That money was never expended, and I never collected one cent of it. I never at any time discussed the matter of the appropriation with Judge Bonner, the auditor.

Mr. STEVENSON. And subsequently they made the same appropriation and the auditor held that it was unconstitutional?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand that the auditor over your protest has been removed by Gov. Reily?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the instance to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. DAVILA. That is the instance.

Mr. STEVENSON. And the auditor who held it unconstitutional was removed?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes. Over my protest.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. I think it is only fair to say that I did not make the statement on the floor without authority. I have it over Gov. Reily's signature, and I have it on the floor, this statement, that he stopped the payment of this $5,000. I am not attempting to decide the truth of this as far as——

Mr. DAVILA. I think such a false charge, made by the governor of Porto Rico against the Representative of the Island in this body, is ample justification for the investigation I am demanding, and for his removal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, if this deficiency bill is enacted into law it means that the total of deficiencies appropriated by this Congress will approximate $550,000,000.

Whenever there is a deficiency it is evident that the Congress that prepared the supply bills for the year was exceedingly careless in arriving at the amount to be provided for the departments, or else since that time Congress has authorized activities demanding additional appropriations. There is only one other explanation, and that is that the Congress deliberately appropriated less than it knew was needed in order to make a showing for political advantage. Whatever be the motive, in this case we find the Congress appropriating deficiencies amounting to more than half a billion of dollars. Therefore it is small wonder that the major[illegible] of the members of the committee now find it necessary to resort to the plan of covering up appropriations in order to mislead the people as to the exact amount of money that is being made available for expenditures. For instance, you are told, and the country will be told, that this bill appropriates $108,415,287.

As a matter of fact, it appropriates, directly and indirectly, $163,915,171. In other words, by legislative provision the party in power is covering up the appropriation of $55,499,884. They not only cover up appropriations that are made, but if you will look at the report you will find, certainly as to one item of $236,000, not one single reference, not one single word, that would let the Congress or the country know that there was made available for expenditure the sum of $236,000 to recondition a ship.

Mr. MADDEN. What ship was that? Is that in this bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In this bill; the ship with the pretty name of Madawaska. If the gentleman will turn to page 37, he will find a provision that:

Not exceeding $236,095 of unobligated balances of appropriations for the support and operation of the Quartermaster Corps of the Army for the fiscal year 1921 may be applied to reconditioning the United States Army transport Madawaska.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is not endeavoring to insinuate that we are trying to cover anything up?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I say it is covered up, whatever the idea is.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman knows that nobody would try to cover anything up.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have only said that this report does not make a statement anywhere under the War Department or any other place that the money is being appropriated to recondition the Madawaska, and only when a man looks through the bill will he find that it is proposed to appropriate $236,000 for this purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the bill state it?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; and that is the unfortunate part of it.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. I know he wants to be fair——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say that I, under any circumstances, would undertake to cover anything up?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I know the gentleman would not. But I will say that the gentleman has changed his opinion in a very short time about the Madawaska, and to the great misfortune of the taxpayers, to the extent of $236,000.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say, if the gentleman will allow me, as it is only fair, that we found upon investigation in this bill that the Madawaska was under construction and not completed, and we could not do anything else than make the appropriation.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman has made a statement, and I will read to the House the statement he made to the committee and what the representative of the department told him—the only source of information this Congress has. If you will turn to page 494, you will find that Col. Smith was very wise. He had gotten onto what the Republican Party is trying to do in appropriating. If you ask for a direct appropriation, you will not get it; but if you ask for an indirect appropriation, for a legislative provision making money available, without making a direct appropriation that would show in the total, you can get it. This is the colloquy that occurred, according to the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, "that not exceeding $236,095 of unobligated balances of appropriations for the support and operation of the Quartermaster Corps of the Army for the fiscal year 1921 may be applied to reconditioning the United States Army transport Madawaska." Have you an unexpended balance?

Col. SMITH. $3,338,074.78.

The CHAIRMAN. Ought not part of that go into the Treasury?

Col. SMITH. It is available for three years to pay obligations incurred in the fiscal year for which the appropriation was made.

Mr. SISSON. It is not obligated and has gone back into the Treasury, really?

Col. SMITH. It is being held to meet obligations incurred during the year for which the appropriation was made.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the Treasury?

Col. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SISSON. It is a question of whether we want to reappropriate this much money?

Col. SMITH. That is what it really means.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the matter with this ship? Why is it necessary to have her reconditioned now, just at this season of the year?

Col. DALTON. The history of this ship——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). It is not a deficiency?

Col. DALTON. It is not a deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. We will not consider it if it is not.

Col. DALTON. There is a letter from the Secretary——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). We may just as well settle that now and waste no time on it. We do not want to consider anything in connection with this bill which is not a deficiency, and an urgent one at that.

That is the record, and after having made a splendid case and having taken the correct position he did what the Senate did in the Newberry case—acted exactly opposite to the conclusion stated. "It is not a deficiency; it is not urgent; we will not have anything to do with it," and then the committee puts in the bill a provision that $236,000 of an unexpended balance shall be available in reconditioning the Madawaska. The Madawaska certainly did appeal to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman in all fairness that the information came to us afterwards, while we were considering the question, after the hearings were closed; and I think my colleagues on the Democratic side of the committee will agree in what I say, that this contract had already been made, that the work was proceeding, and that most of it had been done, and the money was obligated, and there was nothing else for us to do, whatever the record was.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman told the representative of the department that it was not a deficiency, and that he would not have anything to do with it, and the hearing ended and the representative left; and then after the committee adjourned some eloquent person came along and convinced him that he should put in the provision that $236,000 of an unexpended balance should be available for expenditure in reconditioning the Madawaska.

Mr. MADDEN. I will take exception to that statement. The gentleman says that after everybody had gone somebody came to me and convinced me. I deny that.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I understood that to be the statement of the gentleman. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. MADDEN. I said when we were writing up the bill—the committee was there—we decided the question. The chairman did not decide the question. The committee decided it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I know that the chairman would not alone decide it, but what I want to know is, What actuated the chairman in changing his views as stated in the record?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What I want to know is, What were the facts presented to the chairman of the committee? I do not mean to charge that he alone put this in the bill. I mean the entire committee. If the gentleman considers that my criticisms of the item apply to him alone, I do not so mean it.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman said after everybody had gone I did it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I said after the hearings been held.

Mr. MADDEN. Now the gentleman is fair.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. After the hearings adjourned, because I have read all that appears in the record.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is a member of the committee. He knows that hearings are only for the purpose of getting information, and that questions are decided after the hearings adjourn.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. That is all.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman says the hearings are for the purpose of getting information. That is true. He got the positive information at the hearing that it was not a deficiency. He stated it was not a deficiency, and then later he decided that it was a deficiency. The gentleman says he did not alone decide it. He is the chairman of the subcommittee, and his decision is quite influential in that committee and in the whole committee. That is one of the indirect appropriations that are not counted in the total of the bill. Look at the provisions for the Navy Department and you will find there, on page 27, $7,000,000 is made available for the Navy Department. Bless goodness! Did the gentleman from Illinois know that when he made that $7,000,000 available for the Navy Department he had ruined the other gentleman from Illinois, Gen. Dawes, who has already included that $7,000,000 in what he is saving to the people? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Well, in the $112,000,000 Gen. Dawes claimed to have saved there was a considerable sum in the Navy Department, and I feel satisfied it included these items. The $7,000,000 the gentleman from Illinois, Gen. Dawes, thinks he has saved in these continuing appropriations, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] takes away from him; he takes it away from the "Budget savings" and gives it to the Navy Department to spend. I suppose before he gets through Gen. Dawes will claim that he has saved it. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], in his statement to the House on the Treasury bill, said he was going to stop continuing appropriations. He said he was going to ask for a statement showing the amounts unexpended and still available in all the departments. He got that information, and now, having got it, he is using it for a different purpose. Instead of repealing these appropriations and putting that money into the Treasury he is diverting the money to other expenditures. He has taken his stand at the Treasury door and simply said to any department that wants to come in and secure funds, "Go ahead." But if a department approaches with an unexpended balance he says "Stop; let us divert it to one of those deficiency appropriations." The watchword, "They shall not pass," is applied to unexpended balances going back into the Treasury. Now, if in any of the funds diverted by this bill there should come a necessity for additional expenditures prior to June 30 we will be asked for deficiencies to take the place of these funds now diverted to take care of other deficiencies. Yet we are told that this is an economical administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WALSH] having resumed the chair, Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HIMES, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness.

ABANDONED RIGHTS OF WAY GRANTED TO RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 244, a House bill with Senate amendments, for the purpose of asking an agreement to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to call from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 244, with Senate amendments, and agree to the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the House bill and also the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 244) to provide for the disposition of abandoned portions of rights of way granted to railroad companies.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I suppose the gentleman has followed his usual custom of conferring with the minority on the committee?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. I conferred with the ranking member of the minority, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], and he has expressed his satisfaction.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The first amendment does not amount to anything, but will the gentleman explain the second amendment?

Mr. SINNOTT. The second amendment is this: The House bill provided—

That this act shall not affect any conveyance made by any railroad company of portions of its right of way if such conveyance be among those which have been or may be validated and confirmed by any act of Congress.

Now we limit that and say—

Which have been or may—

Inserting the words—

hereafter and before such forfeiture or abandonment—

be validated and confirmed by any act of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, March 3, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. LEATHERWOOD: Committee on Indian Affairs. H. R. 9852. SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, February 23, 1922.)

The Senate met in legislative session at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, proposing to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

France	Lodge	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Gerry	McCormick	Pepper	Warren
Hale	McKellar	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
Harris	McKinley	Poindexter	Weller
Harrison	McNary	Rawson	Willis

Mr. KENDRICK. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] at a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] are attending a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

I was also requested to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] is attending a hearing before the special committee investigating the lobbying activities of the dye industry.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of a death in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators and Mr. HARRELD answered to his name when called.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Glass	Norbeck	Overman	Smith
Gooding	Norris	Pomerene	Stanley
Ladd

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 5 and 6 to the said bill and concurred therein; and that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 28, and concurred therein with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PHIPPS presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the clearing house banks of Denver, Colo., praying for the granting of homesteading preference, home building, and insurance aid to ex-service men, and opposing a cash bonus, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., March 1, 1922.

Hon. LAWRENCE PHIPPS,
United States Senator, Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

The Denver clearing house banks urge that you oppose the enactment of that portion of the soldiers' bonus bill providing for cash compensation without regard to disability as economically unsound and of no permanent benefit to recipients. Relief measures should, in our opinion, be confined to homesteading preference, home building, and insurance aid. The fullest assistance to the disabled is earnestly indorsed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK,
COLORADO NATIONAL BANK,
DENVER NATIONAL BANK,
UNITED STATES NATIONAL BANK,
HAMILTON NATIONAL BANK, GLOBE NATIONAL BANK,
AMERICAN BANK & TRUST CO.,
INTERNATIONAL TRUST CO.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of 7,829 citizens of the city of Quincy, Mass., praying that the battle cruiser Lexington, now under construction at the Fore River yard, be converted into one of the two airplane carriers authorized under the naval treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAPPER presented resolutions unanimously adopted by the Southwestern Veterans' Association, at Dodge City, Kans., favoring the passage of the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, and also additional legislation for the relief of veterans of the Civil War, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KING presented a resolution adopted by the Utah Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, at Salt Lake City, Utah, favoring the making of adequate appropriations for breeding horses for the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NICHOLSON presented a resolution adopted by the mayor and board of trustees of the town of Littleton, Arapahoe County, Colo., favoring continuance of the village free-delivery service and the making of an adequate appropriation therefor, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Logan County and Shaw, Colo., praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Loveland, Denver, Evergreen, Greeley, Fort Collins, New Castle, and Sterling, all in the State of Colorado, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1739) to amend sections 5 and 6 of the act of Congress making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, approved July 1, 1902, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 527) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3083) authorizing the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to construct an elevated railroad siding adjacent to its tracks in the city of Washington, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 528) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MCNARY:

A bill (S. 3226) for the relief of William J. Ewing; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NICHOLSON:

A bill (S. 3227) to extend time for payment of grazing fees to December 1, 1922; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

A bill (S. 3228) to amend the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 3229) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the Ohio Archaeological and Historical Society two German cannon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEYES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for emergency educational and control work on the white-pine blister rust in the eastern white-pine area, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the second deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS OF IMMIGRATION LAW.

Mr. HARRIS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 268) extending the operation of the immigration act of May 19, 1921, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed.

ELSIE HUDSON.

Mr. ODDIE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 248), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Elsie Hudson, widow of J. Lloyd Hudson, late a laborer in the employ of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

JUDGE WILLIAM S. KENYON.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a matter which I think should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. The Washington Times of March 2 contains the following article. I read the headline, as follows:

Impeach Kenyon is demanded. Missouri lawmaker declares "Judas" speech disgraces bench.

The word "Judas" is in quotations. I read the text of the article, as follows:

Charges that William H. Kenyon, of Iowa, is trying to become "a second Judge Landis" were made here to-day by friends of Senator TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY of Michigan in reply to Kenyon's speech before the students of the University of Missouri, in which he referred to NEWBERRY as "a traitor worse than Judas Iscariot."

The subhead line reads:

Spencer accuses judge.

Senator SPENCER of Missouri, NEWBERRY'S chief defender in the Senate, issued a statement to-day in which he charged Kenyon with "insulting the Senate" and "disgracing the bench."

The quotation continues:

"Kenyon knows full well," said SPENCER, "that Senator NEWBERRY is a Christian gentleman of the highest integrity and patriotism.

"To call Senator NEWBERRY 'a traitor worse than Judas Iscariot' dishonors the judge who said it and brings disgrace on the bench which it was hoped would be adorned by the selection of Kenyon.

"Some excuse can be made for such unfounded villification and venomous exaggeration on the stump, though even there it is condemnable, but from a judge upon whose impartiality so much depends it is pitiful.

"One of the leaders of the Senate exclaimed in his indignation 'Kenyon ought to be impeached.'

"Having secured the position he wants, he insults the Senate of the United States by his inference that they seated a traitor, and he seeks to dishonor the President from whom he received his own appointment, because he knows well enough how sincerely and openly the President expressed his condemnation of the malicious and unfounded propaganda against Senator NEWBERRY and his earnest hope that Senator NEWBERRY would be seated."

Mr. President, I am not calling this matter up to reopen the Newberry case, and I am not charging that the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] made the statement attributed to him. I do not know what the facts may be. Neither am I charging that some Senator, who appears here nameless, made the statement attributed to him in the article. I do not know what the facts may be with reference to that part of the article. The article appeared in the Washington Times, which has generally been more accurate than the average newspaper. I am unwilling such an assault should be made upon Judge Kenyon, and printed broadcast over the country, without reply and without rebuke.

I do not know what the language of Kenyon was, but if he had used the language alleged to have been employed it would not have warranted any such assault.

To begin with, former Senator Kenyon had not taken the oath of office as judge at the time he made the speech referred to. In the second place, it does not lie very well in the mouth of those who are constantly talking about "Christian gentlemen" to make an assault of this kind upon William S. Kenyon.

Judge Kenyon served in this Chamber, as I recall, for nearly 11 years. Prior to that time he had served with distinction upon the bench in his own State. At one time he occupied a highly important position in the Department of Justice, where he rendered magnificent service in the prosecution of combinations guilty of violating the Sherman Antitrust Act.

In his private life Judge Kenyon sets an example that might well be emulated by his enemies. In his public career he has steadfastly exhibited an earnestness of purpose, an exaltation of courage and independence, which render him conspicuous at a time when intellectual truckling, political serviency, are too much the order of the day. Without finding myself in agreement with him on many occasions, I nevertheless came to regard him as one of those rare characters who follow the light of conscience and the conclusions of reason, steadfastly placing country and humanity above private interest or personal advancement. He has always had the courage when he believed a thing wrong boldly to proclaim his opinion. He has not been willing to do that which he considered unjust or injurious to the country because it was dictated in party council or because the command came from a party boss.

He left this Chamber with the personal good will, I believe, of practically every Member. He was appointed to an exalted position upon the bench after having declined another position almost as exalted. He has not yet, unless it be within the last few days, taken his seat on that bench, where, in my judgment, he will exhibit the same conscientious regard for the law of his country and the rights of man that has characterized him throughout his life.

Upon a mere newspaper report this assault is made upon him. Those who seek to defend their votes in the Newberry case by an attack upon Judge Kenyon will find that the latter task is as fruitless as the former was difficult. Let it not be forgotten that the seating of Mr. NEWBERRY could be accomplished only by amending the resolution so that it would condemn the methods employed in his election, while ratifying the fruits of the iniquity thus condemned. Judge Kenyon can well disregard attacks by the sponsors of that resolution which at one and the same time admitted and ratified infamy.

I do not desire to prolong my remarks, but I want to put in the RECORD this telegram:

DES MOINES, IOWA, March 3, 1922.

Senator JAMES A. REED,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

I did not make remark SPENCER ascribes to me in his statement, and at time my talk to university students had not taken oath of office and was not a judge, but a private citizen. Have so wired him. I am writing him and you just what I said.

W. S. KENYON.

I have not yet received the letter, because there has not been time for it to be received. I put the telegram in the RECORD, as I think it is due to Judge Kenyon that this statement should be made publicly in order that the wrong done may be instantly corrected.

Mr. POINDEXTER obtained the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just one second I will yield to the Senator.

I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, in the regular RECORD 8-point type, a letter from ex-President Theodore Roosevelt, dated October 19, 1918, addressed to Commander Truman H. Newberry, relating to the character of Senator NEWBERRY and to the issues raised in his election to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From Theodore Roosevelt.]

OYSTER BAY, LONG ISLAND, October 19, 1918.

Commander TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
New York City.

MY DEAR COMMANDER: I congratulate you on your nomination, but far more do I congratulate Michigan and all our people. It was my good fortune to have you serve under me as Secretary of the Navy, and I can testify personally to your efficiency and your disinterested and single-minded zeal for the public service. To a very peculiar degree you have stood for that kind of government which puts the interest of the people as a whole first and foremost, and treats all other considerations as negligible when the public weal is involved. The record made by you and your two sons in this war is typical of your whole attitude as a public servant. Both your boys at once entered the Navy, and are now on the high seas. You sought employment abroad; when that was refused you, you accepted any position that was offered in which you could render public service.

The nomination of Mr. Ford makes the issue sharp and clean. It is not primarily an issue between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party, for Mr. Ford does not seem to have any firm political convictions, and was content to take the nomination on any ticket without regard to what the general principles of the men supporting that ticket were; and his memory about past politics is so hazy that although he has mentioned a Republican candidate for President for whom he thinks he once voted, it does not appear that this is possible, unless he is in error as to his own age.

The issue is infinitely more important than any merely political issue. It is the issue of straight Americanism, of straight patriotism, and of preparedness for the tasks of peace and war, as against a particularly foolish and obnoxious type of pacifism preached in peace and practiced in war. This is the first time in the history of our country in which a candidate for high office has been nominated who has spent enormous sums of money in demoralizing the people of the United States on a matter of vital interest to their honor and welfare. The expenditures on behalf of pacifism by Mr. Ford in connection with the peace ship, and in connection with his great advertising campaign in favor of the McLemore resolution and of the pacifist and pro-German attitude against our participation in the war, was as thoroughly demoralizing to the conscience of the American people as anything that has ever taken place. The failure of Mr. Ford's son to go into the Army at this time, and the approval by the father of the son's refusal, represent exactly what might be expected from the moral disintegration inevitably produced by such pacifist propaganda. Mr. Ford's son is the son of a man of enormous wealth. If he went to war, he would leave his wife and child immeasurably distant from all chance of even the slightest financial strain or trouble, and his absence would not in the smallest degree affect the efficiency of the business with which he is connected. But the son stays at home, protesting and appealing when he is drafted, and now escaping service. Your two sons have eagerly gone to the front. They stand ready to pay with their lives for the honor and the interest of the American people, and while they thus serve America with fine indifference to all personal cost, the son of wealthy Mr. Ford sits at home in ignoble safety, and his father defends and advises such conduct. It would be a grave misfortune to the country to have Mr. Ford in the Senate when any question of continuing the war or discussing terms of peace may arise, and it would be an equally grave misfortune to have him in any way deal with the problems of reconstruction in this country.

Michigan is facing the test, clear-cut and without shadow of a chance for misunderstanding, between patriotism and Americanism on one side, and on the other pacifism and that foolish sham cosmopolitanism which thinks it clever to deride the American flag and to proclaim that it would as soon be a Hindu or Chinaman as an American. If there should be at any time in the future a Hindu senate, and it should choose, in a spirit of cosmopolitanism, to admit outsiders, there is no reason why Mr. Ford should not aspire to membership therein, but he would be signally out of place in the American Senate so long as that body is dominated by men who zealously believe in the American ideal and faithfully endeavor to serve the American people.

Wishing you all success, I am,

Very faithfully, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I also ask leave to print, in connection with that, in the same type, a brief article on the same subject by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], which appeared in The Independent and the Weekly Review for February 18, 1922.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From The Independent and the Weekly Review for Feb. 18, 1922.]

CONCERNING THE NEWBERRY CASE.

A STATEMENT BY SENATOR GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER.

[Almost immediately after taking his seat in the Senate, Senator PEPPER was called on to vote for or against the expulsion of Senator NEWBERRY. He cast his vote in favor of NEWBERRY. In view of his eminence, both in character and ability, it seemed to us that a statement of the ground on which he based his action would be of great public interest. In answer to a letter asking whether he would be willing to make such a statement, Senator PEPPER very kindly placed at our disposal the following memorandum, which he had drawn up as a record of what he would have said, in substance, on the floor of the Senate if he had had an opportunity to speak.—Editors.]

"The Michigan primary was held August 27, 1918. Mr. NEWBERRY was a candidate for the Republican nomination. Mr. Henry Ford announced himself as a candidate for the Republican nomination and also as a Democrat contesting for the Democratic nomination. Ford had a State-wide industrial organization which he was able to use for publicity and campaign purposes without the expenditure of additional money. NEWBERRY, being without this advantage and being continuously absent from the State on naval duty, the committee in charge of his campaign raised and spent about $195,000 to bring his name before the people of the State.

"This money was all spent for purposes authorized by the Michigan statute governing election expenses. Whether the money was wasted or wisely spent is a matter of opinion. It is likewise a matter of opinion as to how much money it is justifiable to spend on campaign publicity. Welfare drives and similar campaigns involve enormous expenditures for such purposes.

"NEWBERRY received the Republican and Ford the Democratic nomination. Within 10 days, as required by law, the Newberry committee published—on September 6—a classified statement exhibiting the receipt and disbursement of the sum above specified.

"Thereupon the Ford machine attacked the expenditure as unjustifiable, and the subject was vehemently discussed all over the State for two months. At the end of two months, namely, on November 5, both candidates left the issue to the people. The people chose NEWBERRY and rejected Ford by a clear majority of over 4,000 votes. Nobody contended in the Senate that this election was other than fair or that money had been used improperly to influence it. The entire expenditure under attack was a preprimary expenditure.

"NEWBERRY, having been duly elected, and the judgment of conspiracy to defraud entered against him having been reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, was sworn in as a Senator and began the discharge of his duties.

"Ford, having thus been twice defeated, once by his fellow citizens and once by the highest court in the land, added still another to his list of affronts to patriotism and decency by instituting in the Senate a contest to wrest NEWBERRY from his seat, although Ford himself had no possible claim of title to it.

"The question before the Senate thereupon was this: Where a Senator is fairly chosen by a majority of the voters of his State after a full public discussion of the expenditures made previous to the primary, shall the Senate vote to expel him on the ground that it would have been in better taste for the majority of voters to vote the other way?

"In other words, shall the Senate substitute its judgment for that of the people of Michigan as to what is a reasonable preprimary expenditure?

"From the moment that I perceived this to be the real question in the case I was never in doubt about the answer. Some Senators who were opposed to expulsion thought fit to couple their conclusion with a condemnation of so large an expenditure. Personally, I had no opinion on that subject, because enormous publicity expenditures are a necessary incident of the direct primary system. My view was—and is—that where charges of corruption are not sustained and where the whole question is one of the reasonableness of the expenditure the people of the State are themselves the final judges and that the Senate should not disturb their verdict.

"I accordingly voted against expulsion, although if I had been framing the resolution I would have framed it differently. I have heard the subject twice reargued in the Senate since the final vote was taken, and these posthumous arguments, which were both vehement and vitriolic, have confirmed me in my opinion that any other decision would have been the mongrel offspring of malice and muddy thinking."

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I am not entirely clear as to why it is necessary for my distinguished colleague to attempt to give Senator Kenyon or Judge Kenyon a certificate of good character as a man. I certainly do not yield to my colleague in my admiration of Judge Kenyon or in my affection or esteem for him. I have known and loved him for many years.

Mr. President, there appeared in the newspapers in Washington, particularly in the Washington Times of February 28, in great headlines stretching across the entire front sheet with the exception of a single column and in letters which were 2 inches high the words:

NEWBERRY a traitor, says Kenyon.

And in prominent letters at the head of an article:

Iowa man attacks Senator as Judas.

And in the language of the paper the following sentences occur as quotations from what Judge Kenyon is supposed to have said at the State University of Missouri:

"Judas Iscariot betrayed his Master, but he gave back the 30 pieces of silver," Kenyon declared. "Senator NEWBERRY and his friends betrayed their country, spent $264,000 for a seat in the United States Senate, and they did not give back the seat."

I said when I read that what I now repeat—that any man who made such statements dishonored himself and disgraced the position which he held, I do not care whether, as a matter of technical fact, he was within 48 hours of becoming a judge or not. He was known as a judge, and introduced as a judge, and spoke to the assembly under the impression in their hearts that he was a judge; and the only thing that interfered with his official character was something with which he alone had to do, and that was the formal taking of the office, for everything else had been done.

I said in the statement that I made to the paper, both at the beginning of it and at the end of it, that I could not believe it was possible that a man of Senator Kenyon's high character could have made such utterances as those. I passed over his misstatement of facts; but his characterization was absolutely unfounded, and branded the man who said it with the disgrace that he attempted to impose upon the man of whom he said it.

I also received a telegram from Senator Kenyon, which, if my distinguished colleague had not already referred to it, I should have asked to have printed in the RECORD, to precisely the same effect as that which my colleague read—that he did not make the statement which he is credited with having made. I am delighted that he did not make it. It corresponds with what I thought of him—that he never would have made it—and, therefore, the statement not having been made by him, my criticism of him, of course, falls with the failure on his part to have made the statement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, did Senator Kenyon, or Judge Kenyon, as he now is, say what statement he did make?

Mr. SPENCER. He telegraphed to me, precisely as he did to my colleague, that he was writing to me the full statement that he did make. I have not yet received that statement.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, to amend the standing rules of the Senate, so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. There seems to be practically no one here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Shortridge
Brandegee	Kendrick	Nicholson	Simmons
Capper	Keyes	Norbeck	Smith
Caraway	Ladd	Norris	Spencer
Culberson	Lenroot	Oddie	Stanley
Cummins	Lodge	Overman	Sterling
Gerry	McCormick	Page	Sutherland
Glass	McKellar	Phipps	Townsend
Gooding	McKinley	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Harreld	McNary	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Harris	Moses	Rawson	Warren
Harrison	Myers	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Heflin	Nelson	Robinson	Weller
Jones, N. Mex.	New	Sheppard	Willis

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] are attending a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, what is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MYERS. May the Secretary read it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

On page 2, line 16, after the word "Appropriations," insert the following: ", and at least one member of the Committee of Agriculture shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Agricultural appropriation bill";

On page 2, line 22, after "Appropriations," insert the following: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Post Office appropriation bill";

On page 3, line 3, after the word "Appropriations," insert the following: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Military Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of War";

On page 3, line 9, after the word "Appropriations," insert: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of the Navy";

On page 3, line 16, after the words "Department of War," insert: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Commerce shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon items pertaining to rivers and harbors contained in the bill making appropriations for the Department of War"; and

On page 3, line 24, after the words "Department of State and Justice," insert: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House when the items pertaining to the diplomatic and consular service are being considered in the bill making appropriations for the Department of State and Justice."

So as to make the amendment of the committee read:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill, and if the point is sustained, the bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations: Provided, however, That the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Agriculture shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Agricultural appropriation bill; that the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Post Office appropriation bill; that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Department of War is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Military Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of War; that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Department of the Navy is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of the Navy; that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the items pertaining to rivers and harbors are being considered by the Committee on Appropriations in the bill making appropriations for the Department of War, and at least one member of the Committee on Commerce shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon items pertaining to rivers and harbors contained in the bill making appropriations for the Department of War; and that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the items pertaining to the Diplomatic and Consular Service are being considered by the Committee on Appropriations in the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and at least one member of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House when the items pertaining to the Diplomatic and Consular Service are being considered in the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the Chair will treat the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts as a single amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to make an inquiry, if the Senator from Montana will permit.

Mr. MYERS. I yield for an inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will state his inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Last evening before adjournment I understood that unanimous consent had been granted for a reprint of the resolution showing these amendments. I am unable to get that kind of a print this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that no such consent was given.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood that that was done.

Mr. WARREN. As to this particular amendment, it would bring about exactly what would take place without it, if the chairman of the Appropriations Committee is correct; that is, that of the three members of any of the various committees who sit with the general committee, and become a part of it, there shall be at least one appointed as one of the three or more conferees when any particular bill goes into conference to reconcile the differences between the Senate and the House.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether, if this amendment is not adopted, the rule would be that not one but two members of that committee would go upon the conference?

Mr. WARREN. No; there would be no rule requiring that, although it would often be done. There is nothing to prevent it.

Mr. LENROOT. That would be the natural thing to do?

Mr. WARREN. It would be very natural in these cases. Of course, we have to provide for absences, sickness, and so on.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course.

Mr. WARREN. But it would be natural in almost every case to take two from the committee which would have jurisdiction of any particular bill and add one from the main Appropriations Committee.

This provides that there must be one conferee at least from the other committee, and does away with the danger which some may feel might exist in case the Committee on Appropriations became arbitrary. I think it has not been accused of being arbitrary heretofore.

Mr. MYERS. I ask the chairman if the pending amendment is offered as an amendment to the committee amendment, found on pages 2 and 3 of the printed resolution.

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator for the information. I am opposed to the committee amendment. If that amendment should be rejected, I think I would favor the resolution. I believe in the consolidation of power in the matter of appropriating money. I believe it would tend to make for economy, but I do not believe much in this proposed disjointed arrangement, a sort of a hocus-pocus affair, of making a Senator a member of the Appropriations Committee to-day and not to-morrow; making him a member for one purpose and not for other purposes; just making of him a sort of a temporary adjunct or convenience, as it were. I believe that if a Senator is a member of the Appropriations Committee at all he should be a member all the time, and should participate in the consideration of all the bills which come before that committee. I believe it is essential for him to have a comprehensive and continuous knowledge of the affairs of the committee in all of its relations in order to coordinate them and produce economies.

If this resolution is to be adopted, I believe it would be better to make the chairman of each one of the committees mentioned on pages 2 and 3 of the Senate resolution permanent members of the Committee on Appropriations, or take three Senators, if you please, from each of these other committees and make them permanent members of the Appropriations Committee. It would be well to make it a committee of 25 or 30 members, as is the case in the House.

I think the proposed arrangement of making a Senator a member of a committee to-day and not to-morrow, and a member for some purposes and not for other purposes, is unknown and without precedent in parliamentary matters. I never heard of it before, and I can not say that I am favorably impressed with the proposed arrangement; but if the Committee on Appropriations were enlarged permanently, so as to give representation to all other committees which have heretofore had the power of considering divers bills for appropriations, and if the power of passing upon all appropriation bills were then centered in the Appropriations Committee, I believe it would work for economy and would be a great improvement upon the present methods.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator whether he thinks it would be possible for a chairman of a major committee to devote the time, as a general member of the Appropriations Committee, to all appropriations coming before it? The chairman of a major committee has his hands full as it is.

Mr. MYERS. Some Senators say the other major committees would not have much to do if the Appropriations Committee had to handle all the appropriation bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. They would have more to do.

Mr. LENROOT. They would have more to do in many cases than they have now.

Mr. MYERS. While the chairman of a major committee other than the Committee on Appropriations might not be able to give strict attention at all times to all things before the Appropriations Committee, he could give a running and more or less continuous attention in a general way. I think he could give a great deal of attention to the business of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest that the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin can be obviated by not making the chairmen of the major committees members of the Committee on Appropriations. Let them devote their time to the other committees and stay off the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MYERS. If this rule is adopted, the Committee on Appropriations might be enlarged.

Mr. NORRIS. If it is necessary; if it is too small to do its work properly and function properly, it ought to be enlarged, of course. I am not saying anything about that.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think it is too small. I think it might well be, though, in that event, enlarged.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that it is the height of folly to put pretty nearly half the Senate on the Committee on Appropriations to-day and off to-morrow. A Senator would be a member of the Appropriations Committee when this thing comes up and not a member when something else is up.

Mr. MYERS. It would be a sort of a hocus-pocus arrangement.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; a regular hocus-pocus affair.

Mr. MYERS. It does not commend itself to me.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator had been here yesterday when the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] spoke, he would have heard him state why that amendment was brought in by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MYERS. I am sorry I was not here. I am always pleased to hear the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, for whom I have high regard.

Mr. NORRIS. It was as I had suspected, and I asked the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] the day before about it, but he did not look at it that way; but the Senator from Minnesota said that provision was put on in order to ease up on Senators who were chairmen of the other committees, get their support of the rule, and make it easy for them for awhile. They thought later on they would take them off the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. It was logrolling.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I assume that is a procedure not wholly unknown in legislative procedure.

If there were in this matter any such consideration, I dare say it is not the first time since I have been here. However, I know nothing of that. I am sure that whatever motive may have prompted the offering of the committee amendment was a legitimate motive. That would be my judgment, anyway. However, I am not favorably impressed with the committee amendment. I much prefer the original resolution. Then, if adopted in that form, the Appropriations Committee could be enlarged. That seems to me to be the better method.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in view of the action of the House in attempting to carry out the planks in both the Republican and the Democratic platforms and to provide for a budget system, it seems to me that they in good faith have worked out that system as best they could. It is already established in the House.

In order that we may meet a condition which has grown out of their action, I believe the Committee on Rules in the Senate have honestly worked out the best coordination possible under the circumstances. Our Appropriations Committee, by virute of the action of the House, have to meet an enlarged field. To most of the Members a great deal of this work is new. By an amendment the committee has provided that the standing committees, acting as appropriating committees, which have heretofore had jurisdiction of particular subjects, shall during the consideration of a particular measure which heretofore they have been charged with be represented on the Committee on Appropriations, to assist in taking care of that particular matter.

It may not be necessary that this should be a permanent arrangement. After the system has been started and we have worked it out it may be possible that we will have a committee charged with that duty which will not need the cooperation or the advice and assistance of those who have heretofore been on these other committees; but it seems to me that in the present condition it is imperative. It is more of an experiment than otherwise. The plan which has been worked out by the Committee on Rules is one which should appeal to the common sense of Senators in this body.

As to the matter of conferences, that is a mere matter of detail. I take it for granted that if the Committee on Appropriations, with the ex-officio members from the different committees having the different divisions of appropriations in hand, think it is a wise thing to do for the public good they will appoint such members of those several committees to appear on conferences to carry out what has been agreed by the Appropriations Committee, in conjunction with the members from the committees having the specific bills in hand, and that the conferees, whether they are appointed from the ex-officio members or from the members of the Appropriations Committee, will carry out the will and intent of the Senate as expressed in whatever amendments or provisions they have put in the bills.

I think that if Senators will make a careful study of this subject they will see that the object of the amendment is not to get more power, and I think it would appeal to Senators who know that this is a new matter, and will have to be worked out with the least friction possible.

I think I shall vote for the resolution as amended by the Committee on Rules and as it is pending before us now, in view of the necessity for some such action because of the action of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I feel deeply about this resolution. I think it is a serious matter. Ordinarily, I do not care so much about having many Senators here when I am talking, but I wish I could have the Members of the Senate here now. I may be entirely wrong, of course, as I know I frequently am, but I feel that the Senate is about to make what I believe will be a serious mistake. I am afraid that the amendment of the committee is going to be adopted as it is written, and yet I am very much in favor of referring all these appropriation bills to one committee. To some extent the present system of appropriating is yet experimental. We have the Budget system, however. We all voted for it. It may be that we are going to be disappointed in it, but I hope not. At least, we ought to give it a fair trial. To do that, to carry out its intent, we ought to place all the appropriation bills in the charge of one committee.

Objection is made to giving the committee so much power, but if Senators will read the amendment of the Committee on Rules they will be convinced, I am satisfied, that the resolution takes away the only danger there is in the proposed rule giving the committee more power. The amendment provides that whenever the Appropriations Committee reports an appropriatiton bill to the Senate and puts in an item of legislation, upon any Sentor making a point of order, the whole bill must be sent back to the committee.

That is a pretty severe penalty. We will not find the Committee on Appropriations bringing in any legislation on appropriation bills with that kind of a provision in the rule. That is where the danger has been in the past. That is where jokers have very frequently crept into laws. That is where the Senate and the House have been at fault in bringing about legislation. The poorest way on earth, all students of the question concede, is to legislate on appropriation bills. The theory of the rule of rejecting legislation on appropriation bills is in order to separate the two things, legislation and appropriations. This rule will do it, and I am not at all afraid with that amendment in it that there is going to be any danger about the Committee on Appropriations having too much power.

But the Committee on Rules has gone further and added another amendment, which provides that whenever they have an appropriation bill before the Committee on Appropriations which heretofore went to one of the other standing committees of the Senate, thereupon three members of the other committee shall for the time being automatically become members of the Committee on Appropriations. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] very frankly told us yesterday in substance, as I understood it, that the Committee on Rules put that in to ease up other Senators who would be fearful that they were losing some of their power.

It is provided, for instance, that the chairman and two other members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry shall be placed on the Appropriations Committee whenever the Agricultural appropriation bill was up for consideration, and the suggestion is that by putting that provision in the rule they expect to get the support of the chairman and other members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The same thing applies to all the other standing committees which heretofore have had appropriation bills referred to them.

That may be wisdom or not, as far as getting votes is concerned. To my mind it is not the right way to legislate, and I hope that no member of any other committee, be he chairman or an ordinary member of the committee, will have his vote influenced by the idea that if the provision is put in some additional power will still be lodged in him. I do not think it ought to be lodged in any of those committees in the matter of appropriations. If the Committee on Appropriations is too small when that is done, we can make it larger. My own idea is it will not have to be enlarged because we have taken away from the Appropriations Committee the power to legislate on appropriation bills, and that means that their labors are going to be lessened a great deal.

If a Senator is a member of the Committee on Appropriations for one purpose, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has so well said, it seems to me he ought to be there for all purposes. The justice of that ought to appeal to every Senator. If the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations goes on the Appropriation Committee for one purpose he ought to be there permanently. If they put the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on the Committee on Appropriations when appropriating for the Agricultural Department, why for the same reason should we not put the chairman of the Judiciary Committee on the Committee on Appropriations when we are appropriating for the Department of Justice? Why not put the chairman and two other members of the Committee on Indian Affairs on the Committee on Appropriations when they are passing on the Indian appropriation bill?

If we do put all those members on and treat them all the same, what will we have? I have made a computation roughly, and I find that if we do that and keep them on we would have an Appropriations Committee consisting of 49 members, and that is a quorum of the Senate. Everybody know that is too large a committee. I think all of our committees are too big now for real practical legislation. Why put any of them on? Why not let the Appropriations Committee go on as it is? If this is a vote-getting proposition to get Senators' votes, why then stop at the committees? Why not take other organizations? Why not say that the Democratic caucus organization shall have so many members on the Committee on Appropriations, and the Republican organization shall have its chairman and so many other members on? Some one suggests why not the farm bloc? Why not, when they are appropriating for anything in which the farmers are interested, provide that the chairman and two other members of the farm bloc should be on the Appropriations Committee?

That reminds me that the farm bloc, I understand, has just recently met and elected a new chairman. They have a new leader, the old leader having been elevated out of the Senate. They now have a new leader—the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]—and that, by the way, was the first notice that I had had that the Senator from Kansas was a candidate for appointive office under the presidential prerogative.

Coming back again, why not leave the Appropriations Committee just as it is and turn all the appropriation bills over to it? It is said that they are not posted on some of the bills that have been before other committees as well as some of the other committees are. I presume for a time that would be true. It is natural to suppose that the Committee on Appropriations, for instance, would not be as familiar with the Army appropriation bill as would the Committee on Military Affairs, but that is only temporary and will soon be cured. As a matter of fact, in practice they really are now. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, sitting here before me, has for years and years served as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. For a great many years longer than I have served he was a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and yet I am chairman of that committee now and he is not even a member of it. He probably knows more about the appropriations of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry than I do. I want to ask him now if he is still a member of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. WARREN. I am.

Mr. NORRIS. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, now a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, has been a member of that committee longer than the present chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has been a Member of the Senate, so that is mostly a fiction when we come to those propositions.

Go on down the list of the Committee on Appropriations and see what the situation is. It will be found almost invariably that some member, perhaps two or three members, are members now or have been members of all of the other committees which handle appropriation bills in the Senate. Even if that were not true, it will only be a session or two until that condition would be remedied. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or the Committee on Naval Affairs, or the Committee on Commerce, has no business to be on the Committee on Appropriations. They ought to be excluded by the rules of the Senate from membership on any of the other large major standing committees. If they do their duty to the committees of which they are chairmen, they will not have any time to serve on any other committees.

I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations now, how many meetings of the Committee on Military Affairs he has attended during this session?

Mr. WARREN. I have to admit that I have been often absent. I have to be absent, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, and I was going to say that. It is not disrespect to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to say that he has been absent from meetings of the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a physical impossibility for him to attend the meetings of the Committee on Military Affairs and still do his duty as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. It can not be done, so I am not speaking of it in censure. The same criticism would apply to me if the rule were adopted. It applies to every chairman of a major committee. They can not do duty in two places at once. They can not perform their full duty as members of the Committee on Appropriations, because their time is taken up with the details of all the other bills that are pending before their own committees.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will allow me, his argument seems to suppose that under this amendment he would necessarily be required to attend all the meetings of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH. When, as a matter of fact, he would only be required to attend when the matter with which he is familiar in the ordinary discharge of his committee work would be before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; if the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, while he is attending the Appropriations Committee, must cease its labor, then the Senator's argument is good, but that will not happen, at least not without a great deal of criticism. For instance, the Committee on Military Affairs——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Just let me finish this illustration and then I will gladly yield to the Senator. I would rather take some other committee than the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, so I will take the Military Affairs Committee for illustration. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is the very efficient chairman of that committee. Suppose that the Army appropriation bill were before the Committee on Appropriations and this rule had been adopted, he would be in attendance upon the meetings of the Committee on Appropriations and in attendance all the way through the consideration of the Army appropriation bill. It might last two weeks, it might last longer, perhaps not so long, but all the while he was there he necessarily, while devoting his attention to that, could not take care of the business before the Committee on Military Affairs. He would have to turn that over to somebody else. Other members of the committee would not be equipped to pick it up just where he left off, and when he got back again he would not be fully equipped to pick it up just where somebody else left it. It seems to me, under the most efficient plan of legislation, that we ought to allow these men to remain where their duties call them and let them become experts in their own particular line.

I yield now to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that under the present system the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry must occupy all the time necessary for framing the appropriation bill, and while the chairman and other members of that committee are occupying their time with the appropriation bill now there will be no greater time occupied by the Committee on Appropriations in the consideration of the same bill.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. So that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will have the same amount of time for the consideration of other business that they now have.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought I answered that in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina. The chairman and two other members of the committee would be there, and if we said to the balance of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, "While they are over yonder considering the appropriation bill, you must remain silent and do nothing," then the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin and of the Senator from South Carolina would be good.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, when does the Senator's committee meet?

Mr. NORRIS. It meets every day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Every day?

Mr. NORRIS. Practically so.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. NORRIS. Almost every day.

Mr. SMITH. That, if the Senator will allow me, is only when there are certain matters before the committee on which we are having hearings, but to consider the ordinary routine business that comes before our committee in the ordinary course of events we would not meet more than once or twice a week, if so often as that.

Mr. NORRIS. I probably ought to modify the answer I made to the Senator from North Carolina. We do not meet every day ordinarily. For instance, we have met every day this week except Monday, and I presume we will meet every day next week.

Mr. OVERMAN. I presume that is true sometimes when investigations are being held.

Mr. NORRIS. We are having hearings all the time.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the committee does have a regular day for meeting, I presume.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is what the Senator wants to know, it is on Tuesday.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Committee on Appropriations would have to regulate its meetings to suit the Committee on Agriculture and meet on some day when the Committee on Agriculture did not meet. That is the point I wanted to make.

Mr. NORRIS. But the members would not be able to perform their duties on the Committee on Appropriations in one day. Suppose the Committee on Appropriations met on Wednesday, they would not get through on Wednesday. None of the appropriation bills are going to be finished in one day.

What I am calling to the attention of the Senate, and especially to the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin, is that while these three members from the Agricultural Committee are working with the Appropriations Committee the other members of the Agricultural Committee are practically shut off from doing anything, and when that condition existed for a week or two it might present a serious proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator from Nebraska admit that his committee would then have just as much time for legislative business as it now has——

Mr. NORRIS. No; I will not admit that.

Mr. LENROOT. Because the committee now would require at least an equal amount of time in the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, and they could not be considering legislative business while they were considering the appropriation bill, with all of the hearings which would be necessary. So if the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and two other members shall attend the sessions of the Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of considering the Agricultural appropriation bill the Agricultural Committee will have just as much time for the consideration of legislative matters as it now has.

Mr. NORRIS. I will admit that it would if the committee went on and did business without its chairman and the other two members, but what is the committee going to do while the chairman and the other two members are sitting with the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. LENROOT. What do they now do when the Agriculture Committee is considering the appropriation bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Then the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are all present in the committee, and if they are not considering the Agricultural appropriation bill they may be considering some other bill; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. LENROOT. In reference to the point which the Senator makes, that the chairman and two members of the Committee on Agriculture sitting with the Committee on Appropriations will not enlarge the time of the Agriculture Committee for the consideration of legislative business, does he not admit that the Committee on Agriculture will have just as much time as they now have?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not admit anything of the kind——

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator has to admit it.

Mr. NORRIS. Because while the chairman and the two other members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are sitting with the Appropriations Committee, the Agriculture Committee are tied up or they must proceed to do business without the chairman and the other two members.

Mr. LENROOT. But are they not tied up now, so far as consideration of legislative business is concerned, when the committee is considering the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. NORRIS. But under the proposed rule the committee would not consider appropriation bills; their time would not be taken up entirely with legislative matters, and they would not have time then to consider everything that comes before them.

Mr. LENROOT. They would have just as much time should this rule be adopted as they now have, would they not?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator see that when his committee is considering an appropriation bill the time is occupied with that matter, and if they are relieved from the consideration of the appropriation bill it does not deprive them of any time for other matters?

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let us see what would happen. Suppose this proposed rule be adopted and that to-morrow the Agricultural appropriation bill comes to us from the other House and is referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Three members, including the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, at once go over to the Appropriations Committee. Suppose they take a week in the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, what will the Agriculture Committee be doing during that week?

Mr. LENROOT. What would they be doing under the present practice?

Mr. NORRIS. They would be considering legislation of some kind.

Mr. LENROOT. No; under those circumstances they would be considering the appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. Suppose they were now considering an appropriation bill; when they do not have an appropriation bill to consider they consider other legislation which may be before them. They are working all the time.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; so that anything the committee may do in the way of hearings in the absence of the chairman and the two other members of the committee is just that much additional time given to the Agricultural Committee if this rule be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is not.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course it is.

Mr. NORRIS. The facts are, Mr. President, that the practical working of this proposed rule will be that the various committees will not do anything while the chairmen and two other members of the committees are sitting with the Appropriations Committee. That will bring a great deal of criticism not only from the members of the committee but from others who are interested in pending legislation. They will say, "Why are you not going ahead with this bill or with that bill or some other bill which is of vast importance? Why do you not go on with that legislation?" Our reply must be, "Three of our members have been called away over into the Committee on Appropriations."

Then, Mr. President, that is not all. Bear in mind that under the present existing circumstances all the committees when they are considering the so-called appropriation bills are, as a matter of fact, very often devoting all their time to the consideration of legislation which is carried on those bills. Those matters will still be left with the various committees, and the Appropriations Committee will have no jurisdiction of anything of that kind, but will have jurisdiction only of the formal matter of making appropriations.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 5 and 6 to the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 28, with an amendment after the word "Capitol" to insert a comma and the words "to cost not exceeding $250."

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate. That is the only amendment now in disagreement.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before that is done, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senators will allow me to finish and that both requests will be withdrawn.

Mr. WARREN. There has been a suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi following my motion, so that I am unable to comply with the request of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Heflin	Moses	Sheppard
Ball	Johnson	Myers	Smith
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Spencer
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	New	Stanfield
Bursum	Kellogg	Newberry	Sterling
Capper	Kendrick	Norris	Sutherland
Caraway	Keyes	Oddie	Swanson
Culberson	King	Overman	Townsend
Cummins	Ladd	Page	Wadsworth
Ernst	Lenroot	Pepper	Walsh, Mass.
Gerry	Lodge	Phipps	Warren
Hale	McCormick	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Harris	McKellar	Rawson	Weller
Harrison	McKinley	Robinson	Willis

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. There is a motion pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the Senate amendment numbered 28 to House bill 10267, the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the item?

Mr. WARREN. It is a simple matter. The amendment of the Senate provides that the Architect of the Capitol may, on requisition, have printing and binding done at the Government Printing Office. The amendment of the House to the Senate amendment in which I have moved to concur is to fix a limit of $250 on such printing and binding. That is all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask if that concludes matters in disagreement between the two Houses?

Mr. WARREN. It does as to this particular bill.

Mr. KING. Was that the only item in disagreement between the House and the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. No; there were two other amendments in disagreement, from which disagreement the House has receded, and on the third amendment they have receded with the amendment in which I have moved to concur.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is passed.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate, so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there are several divisions of the amendment, as I understand. Was the request made that they all be incorporated in one amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That request was made.

Mr. LODGE. The question can be put on each subdivision of the amendment if the Senator desires a slower movement.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not know the Senate had taken action. I suggest that I have an amendment which I think goes to the very root of this proposition, and, if it shall be adopted, there will be no necessity for the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Is the Senator's amendment a substitute?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I have offered it in the form of an amendment and not as a substitute touching the appointment of conferees. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts provides for the appointment as a conferee of one member of the Committee on Agriculture, for instance——

Mr. LODGE. At least one.

Mr. HARRISON. When the conferees are considering agricultural appropriations. The amendment which I have offered provides for at least two. The difference between the suggestion carried in the proposed rule as reported out by the Rules Committee and the amendment which I have offered is briefly this—and it is such a division of the proposition that it seems to me it ought to be voted on first——

Mr. McCORMICK. Is the text of the amendment at the desk?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator's amendment apply only to the question of conferees?

Mr. HARRISON. No; but I was going to explain the other difference. There are just two differences between my amendment and that proposed by the Committee on Rules. One is about the conferees. The original resolution that was suggested by the Committee on Rules as presented by the Senator from Kansas provides for no conferees coming out of these respective committees, three of the members of which act as ex officio members. All of the conferees may come out of the Appropriations Committee. That change is sought by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I propose in my amendment that all bills shall go to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate; that if it is a matter affecting agriculture, a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, consisting of three members of that committee, shall sit with the whole Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and then the bill shall be reported back, and that when it goes into conference at least two members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry shall go on the conference committee.

Those are the only differences between the propositions. The proposed resolution as reported out of the committee gives to the Appropriations Committee full power, acting with three members from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, if it is a matter of agriculture, and providing for no member of the Agricultural Committee to go on the conference committee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment that I have suggested be voted on first. If that is voted down, then we can take up these other amendments.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator is entirely impracticable, and in fact impossible, as I shall explain.

Mr. HARRISON. I am asking now for unanimous consent to have my amendment voted on first, and then we can discuss it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my amendment is the pending amendment, and I should like a vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, I object to dividing the proposition and ask for a separate vote on each one of the propositions.

Mr. LODGE. There is no harm in that. It only takes a little more time.

Mr. HARRISON. We have plenty of time.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the Senator has.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will bear in mind that it has agreed to consider the amendments proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts as a single amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was watching for that, because it was a proper question that I was going to raise; and while I do not want to take issue with the Presiding Officer, I submit that while the Presiding Officer was putting the question some one was on the floor speaking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair asked if there was any objection to considering the amendments proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts as a single amendment. There was no objection to that request, and that is the order of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It was agreed.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the effect of this amendment, of course, will be practically to put the entire matter of the appropriations, in each branch of the appropriations, in the control of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, then either the Senator has grossly misunderstood the effect of this or I have. The effect of this was to make it absolutely certain that the legislative committee would be represented on every conference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. By one member.

Mr. LODGE. By at least one member.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand that the rule as reported by the Appropriations Committee would provide for the representation of the committees now having charge of these several appropriations by three members.

Mr. LODGE. That is, on the committee when the bill is being made up. My amendment applies solely to the conference and was intended to secure beyond any doubt the representation of the legislative committee on the conference committee. That is all that my amendment does.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then I withdraw the statement. I thought it related to the representation on the committee.

Mr. LODGE. No; only to the conference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My purpose in addressing the Chair was to verify a statement which I made yesterday in regard to the practices of the Appropriations Committee under the existing system. I called attention then to substantiate a proposition that I made, to an instance where the Naval Academy had been put almost in a state of demoralization by what Congress afterwards determined to be ill-advised legislation, without notice and evidently without consideration by the Committee on Appropriations, not only appropriating money for naval affairs but legislating, changing existing law by providing that midshipmen at the Naval Academy could not be dismissed when they had failed in their examinations. Several Senators, especially the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, very positively asserted that I was mistaken about that and that that had not been done by the general Appropriations Committee, but that that law had been reported by the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that if he will give me the title of the bill I shall be able to straighten out what I think is in his mind.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator need not bother himself about straightening it out. I am going to straighten it out right now. I call the Senator's attention to part 1 of volume 41 of the Statutes at Large, on page 1028, being a section of an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, approved June 5, 1920, which contains this provision——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one second, and then I will yield:

That until otherwise provided by law no midshipman found deficient at the close of the last and succeeding academic terms shall be involuntarily discontinued at the Naval Academy or in the service unless he shall fail upon reexamination in the subjects in which found deficient at an examination to be held at the beginning of the next and succeeding academic terms—

Nobody could find out what that meant—and the Secretary of the Navy shall provide for the special instruction of such midshipmen in the subjects in which found deficient during the period between academic terms.

My recollection was that that was in a bill reported from the general Appropriations Committee. I find my recollection verified by finding it printed in the Statutes at Large in a bill that was reported by that committee.

Mr. WARREN. I understand perfectly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, it might have been printed there by mistake.

Mr. WARREN. No, Mr. President; the Senator is right in what he is presenting now, and I was right in what I said.

In the first place, the Appropriations Committee never has made an appropriation of that kind in its regular annual appropriation bill; but when it comes to deficiencies that occur when there are no regular bills, it is the naval people who ask, through the Navy Department, that the general Appropriations Committee may take it up and provide in a deficiency item for some immediate want. It does not need any further rule or any rule to change that, because it stands there, and is the only thing that does stand undisturbed—that the deficiency bills shall be handled by the full Committee on Appropriations, the general Committee on Appropriations—and it has been that committee's duty heretofore to respond to these calls from the Secretary of the Treasury to make up deficiencies. That went in as a war measure as to Annapolis, just as it did as to West Point. The only misunderstanding between the Senator and me is that I alluded, of course, to the annual bills, the regular bills of the regular committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; the Senator is mistaken. He did not make that allusion, if I may be permitted to say so.

Mr. WARREN. Whatever allusion I made, the Senator just read the title of the bill, and it is a bill appropriating money to supply deficiencies.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Who has charge of the deficiency bills?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. What other committee has anything to do with that except to ask, through that committee, for what it wants?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No other committee has anything to do with them.

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But the Senator says now that he did not assert that the measure to which I refer was acted upon by the general Appropriations Committee. I hold in my hand the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is reported as saying:

No; the Senator is mistaken about that. The same thing was done at West Point which the Navy attempted to do at Annapolis, in order to get more men into the field; but as to the academy at Annapolis, it was a Navy move entirely. I think very likely it was in a naval appropriation bill. It must have been in the regular naval appropriation bill.

The Senator is entirely mistaken about that. It was not in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. I want to make any restitution that will make the Senator feel satisfied, and I am ready to do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is very gratifying.

Mr. WARREN. What I stated there was what ought to be, and what would have been, and what is, as a matter of fact, what the Navy asked for, and what the Appropriations Committee did at its request.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if that is not a good argument for this amendment? If it had been in effect, the Senator probably would have been on the conference committee that handled the deficiency bill and could have corrected any mistake.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Whereas the committee was composed of Senators who knew nothing about naval matters, and this item was sent down to our committee by the department, and we were bound to accept it from the department; but if the Senator's committee had been represented on the Appropriations Committee we could have corrected any mistake.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It might have been. I was citing it rather as an instance of abuses arising under the existing system.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand; but does not the Senator think that is a good argument for this new rule?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It might be used as a good argument for this new rule, or it might be used as an argument for depriving the general Appropriations Committee of jurisdiction over any naval appropriations, and consolidating all those appropriations in the Naval Affairs Committee. The same rule would apply to the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. In order to avoid the diversity of committees acting upon military appropriations or naval appropriations or agricultural appropriations, it is not necessary to send them to the general Appropriations Committee. It can be accomplished by consolidating them in these several committees under the different heads. So far as the machinery is concerned, and so far as meeting the condition existing in the House of Representatives is concerned, that would be practically the same as dividing up the general Appropriations Committee into subcommittees and having those subcommittees take charge of the several appropriation bills affecting the different branches of the Government. I do not see where any change in principle would be accomplished by that from having other committees specializing in those branches and having charge of all the appropriations on those subjects.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the pending amendment, proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, I am afraid its only effect might be in part to defeat the purpose that is intended to be accomplished by it. I can not conceive of any chairman of the Committee on Appropriations who would not appoint at least one of the ex officio members on a conference on a bill over which those ex officio members had jurisdiction. Not only would the chairman naturally appoint one, but he would naturally appoint two. He would appoint the majority chairman and the ranking minority member of the legislative committee; but I am afraid that if, by this language, we say that at least one shall be appointed, some Committee on Appropriations will make it the rule to appoint one instead of two, when, as I said a moment ago, if the rule is entirely silent upon the subject no chairman of the Appropriations Committee would ever think of appointing a conference committee without having at least one of the ex officio members upon it.

Mr. LODGE. I am afraid I do not quite see the force of the argument that we are less likely to get representation when the rule provides we shall have it than if it does not so provide.

Mr. LENROOT. We shall have representation, but we are more likely to have only one member on the conference committee, when, if the rule is silent, I think the custom will be to have two.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to change it to two; but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. WARREN. That would be impossible under certain circumstances. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is all right, but if it were made two——

Mr. LODGE. I do not want it changed to two. I think it is perfectly needless.

Mr. WARREN. I understand, but there is a suggestion that it be made two under the rule. When it comes to the consideration in the Committee on Military Affairs of the river and harbor appropriation, we shall have three men from that committee and three men from the Committee on Commerce, and then we shall have the general committee itself. We could not very well appoint on the conference committee two men from each of those committees without coming pretty near making the whole committee from those members.

Mr. LODGE. My whole purpose is to make it absolutely sure that ex officio members, that is, the members of the legislative committees, shall be represented on every conference. If we have it provided by law that there shall be one, we will be a great deal safer than if we have no provision in the law with regard to it whatever.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he thinks the chairman of any Committee on Appropriations would decline to appoint at least one of the conferees from the three men having special knowledge of the subject?

Mr. LODGE. I think if there were no rule that might very well be done.

Mr. LENROOT. I differ with the Senator from Massachusetts. It must be remembered that it is generally the rule that wherever a piece of legislation fixes a minimum, it becomes a maximum, and I think there will likely be less representation for the legislative committees upon the conferences than if the rule were silent upon the subject. That is my only reason for being against it.

Mr. BALL. I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if the chairman could appoint any ex officio member on a conference committee unless it was provided for in a resolution changing our rules?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes; under this language.

Mr. BALL. Unless there is something adopted making such a provision, it could not be done. Left as it is, without any amendment such as that offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations could only appoint conferees from the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is mistaken, because these members are members of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. BALL. Ex officio members only.

Mr. LENROOT. They are members of the Committee on Appropriations, so far as that particular bill is concerned, to as full an extent as members of the Committee on Appropriations. They are members for all purposes, so far as that bill is concerned.

Mr. President, on the merits of the committee amendment, I want to say, first, with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in commenting upon the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] yesterday as to the purpose of this amendment being one to catch votes, I happen to know that this plan was suggested, not by any member of the Committee on Rules, not by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], but by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations himself, Mr. WARREN. I have taken an interest in this subject for a long time, ever since the Budget system was proposed a great many years ago, and it so happened that I, in conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations many weeks ago, made the same suggestion as to this being a plan which would be practical, and the chairman stated that the very day before he had made a speech in the Senate advocating that plan, which I did not happen to know anything about. So there is not the slightest foundation for the assertion that this plan was originated, at least, for the purpose of catching votes of Senators in support of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It occurs to me that a Democratic convention suggested this idea many years ago.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true. I am very glad to give a Democratic convention credit for some good things in its platform, and that is one of them.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit me to say that I feel very much strengthened in my opposition to it now, since I know where it originated?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is to be expected of the Senator from Nebraska. He is always a partisan.

Mr. LENROOT. On the merits of this amendment we have two extremes, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who contends that the appropriation bills should go to the committees as they now exist, in repudiation of his own party platform, I may say, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] on the other extreme, who is in favor of centralization but desires that the present membership of the Committee on Appropriations shall have full jurisdiction of all appropriation bills, without the aid or assistance of any members of the committees now having jurisdiction of appropriations.

As to the position taken by the Senator from Mississippi, I can well understand how any Senator who has no regard for economy, who is not interested in Congress doing the business of the Government in a businesslike way, should take the position which the Senator from Mississippi takes, although I confess I would not have expected the Senator from Mississippi, who is so prominent in the councils of the Democratic Party, to advocate an express repudiation of one of his own party pledges, even though he had no regard for economy, even though he had no regard for the business of the Government being conducted in a businesslike way.

Mr. President, something of this kind must be done if the Budget system is to be of any substantial value.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Like the Senator from Wisconsin, I have held the view for a long time—long before this amendment to the rule was introduced—that some such reform must be carried through; but I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, who has studied this problem, in lieu of the provisions under the amendment as reported from the committee that the chairman and two other members of the several committees shall be ex officio members of the Appropriations Committee, does he not believe that the chairman and four other members ought to be ex officio members?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very frank to say to the Senator that I do not.

Mr. McCORMICK. How many members should sit on a subcommittee?

Mr. LENROOT. I think five is the limit that ever ought to sit on a subcommittee on appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am interested in the discussion by the Senator from Wisconsin. I would like to know, though, how greater economies are to be effected by turning all appropriations over to one committee and taking them away from the committees which have specialized for years in the administration of certain departments of the Government. For instance, take the case of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The membership have studied the plans of the Department of Agriculture, are familiar with the various wants of the country, all are experts in the wants of their various communities, knowing the community wants and desires. How can one committee, which is already overburdened and is not familiar with this work, effect greater economies or do more for the agricultural development of this country than that committee, which has constantly had it under its jurisdiction and is familiar with the character of the work?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think the Senator could have quite understood what I meant by the use of the term "economy." I think the Senator will admit that no business institution could exist for 12 months if it had a board of directors which had to do with the revenues of the corporation and then divided authority over expenditures between half dozen different committees, no committee knowing or caring about what the other committee on expenditures was doing. The corporation would go into bankruptcy, of course.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is not an analogous case at all. A private corporation, functioning in a certain line, is very different from a great Republic with a manifold diversification of activities. That is a puerile and childish illustration.

Mr. LENROOT. I am going to stop the Senator right there. Let us see whether that is a puerile kind of an illustration.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. LENROOT. Some Senators may think that business principles should not enter into the conduct of the affairs of the Government of the United States. I do.

Mr. McNARY. Well——

Mr. LENROOT. Just a moment; I want to answer the Senator. I can not imagine any Senator who would occupy the position that in making expenditures of this Government they should not be made with some relation to the receipts of the Government. Does the Senator from Oregon take that position?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, again the proposition is inapplicable and the inquiry a foolish one. I do not admit that the Senator from Wisconsin is the only one who wants to practice economy, or is familiar with the business conditions of the Government. I asked the simple question, which he has not answered, how one committee, unfamiliar with the investigations conducted by other committees, can cope with the committee which has specialized on the particular subject?

Using the same illustration, how can the Appropriations Committee understand agricultural conditions, effect economies, and administer the department as well as the committee which has worked upon agricultural appropriation bills and agricultural legislation for years? How would economy be effected in that case?

Mr. LENROOT. In the first place, so far as the Appropriations Committee is concerned, this very amendment, adding these ex officio members, is solely for the purpose of aiding the Committee on Appropriations in that very matter. But again the Senator misses the point. We have to estimate the revenue in a given year from existing revenue laws, and under the present system we have no committee or combination of committees which, in the consideration of appropriation bills, and in the expenditures of the department over which it has jurisdiction, has anything to do or to say with regard to balancing expenditures with receipts.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I concede there is want of an agency in our Government functioning in that field; but by centralizing all the power in one large committee, which is already overworked, we would not accomplish that which the Senator from Wisconsin would like to see accomplished.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see whether we would or not. If we have a central body or authority, that committee would have to estimate the receipts of the Government, and that committee, if it performed its duty, would then see to it that the aggregate of appropriations was not in excess of the receipts.

Mr. McNARY. What would this committee have to do with the balancing of receipts and expenditures? It would simply expend the money raised from and by and through another source. The Finance Committee recommends the laws under which the money is raised.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; that is true.

Mr. McNARY. The Committee on Appropriations provides for the expenditure of the money which has been collected through taxation.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. No more and no less, the same as we are doing to-day.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly; and if the Committee on Appropriations performs its duty, it will see to it that appropriations are not made in excess of the estimated receipts, and now there is no consideration or thought of that whatever.

Let me give the Senator an illustration. I happen to be a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee has taken into consideration the financial situation of the Government.

I do not hesitate to say that while that committee has refrained from making appropriations that seemed to it at times very necessary, it has declined to do it because of the condition of the Treasury, and yet when we come to the floor we find another bill which shows that other committees have not done likewise. That is a reform that will be accomplished through the amendment of the rule.

Mr. McNARY. Does not the Senator believe it was the purpose of the founders of the Government that every State and every community should be represented in Congress?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. Will taking away the representation on a large committee and placing it in the hands of a few be following out the dictates and purposes enunciated in our holy document, the Constitution?

Mr. LENROOT. Is every State represented now on the Committee on Appropriations? Is every State now represented on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, making appropriations for the agricultural interests? Is every State represented on the Committee on Military Affairs? Is there any more a denial of representation in the one case than in the other?

Mr. McNARY. Absolutely. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is composed of 17 Senators taken from the different geographical sections of the country having a difference in soil, climate, and productivity. It is proposed to take three members from that committee and put them on a committee which might not have a member from the far West, where conditions are entirely different from those in the State of Wisconsin, in the South, or in the Central West.

Mr. LENROOT. Again the Senator must understand, being a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, that that committee can introduce legislation that gives the Committee on Appropriations no discretion except to make an appropriation.

Mr. McNARY. Does not the Senator from Wisconsin know that that is a large function of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, upon which the agricultural interests are more or less dependent?

Mr. LENROOT. Again the Senator misses my point. His Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, if Congress will approve the action that it takes, may introduce legislation that will compel the Committee on Appropriations to make any appropriation that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry may deem necessary and that Congress will approve.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Wisconsin is stating a situation that never could arise. A bill has to be formed and made up by the committee. It will then be brought back here, and it is a favorite system in the Senate to vote with the committee. Ninety per cent of the time the membership responds to the report of the committee, and if the Committee on Appropriations should bring in a bill that was not thought to be fair to the agricultural interests of the country, the rest of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry not on the Appropriations Committee would be powerless to get the relief which they would have effected if it had been left to them and the other representatives upon the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. In response to the Senator from Oregon upon that point, let us see how agriculture would stand even under the Committee on Appropriations without the addition of the ex officio members. Does the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] come from an agricultural State? Does he represent an agricultural State?

Mr. McNARY. Oh, Mr. President, I do not propose to stand here and analyze the habits, behavior, and mental status of the various members of that committee. I can say in that case, though, that his part of the country, if the Senator would understand it, he being more familiar with his own part of the country, does not raise the same products that are raised in the State of Oregon west of the mountains, and he is just as unfamiliar with those conditions as I am with the conditions in his State.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is one. He does represent an agricultural interest, does he not, which is practically wholly agricultural? The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is the next member. Does he represent an agricultural State or not? The next is the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. Does he represent an agricultural State, and does he represent the agricultural interests of Oregon or not? The next is the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. Is Kansas an agricultural State or not? Mr. Kenyon has gone. The next is the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. Is the Senator from Maine not interested in agriculture as a member of this committee? The next is the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER]. Is Missouri not an agricultural State? The next is the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS].

Mr. McNARY. I think as to the Senator from Missouri, he represented at one time on the floor sunflower seed, which we do not raise in Oregon.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator mean to say that raising sunflower seed is the extent of the agricultural interests of the State of Missouri?

Mr. McNARY. As I said to the Senator, I do not propose to criticize these eminent farmers whom he has mentioned, but I I do say that those who have been on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for years and have made a study of the agricultural and horticultural interests of the country and all those things associated with the production of agricultural products are in better shape to understand an agricultural bill than men not familiar with it at all and who now have more on their shoulders than they can carry.

As the Senator knows, during the three or four years I have been here I have spent many weeks in hearings. One becomes familiar with the questions that surround agriculture in every section of the country. He knows the needs of the farming communities. He is in touch with them. His sympathies are with them. He is in far better shape to administer that great industry than the few men who have to do with the Army appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, the river and harbor bill, and similar bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I fail to catch the point of the Senator from Oregon, representing the farmers' interests on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. When he wants certain things done for his section and other sections, what does he do? He introduces legislation for it and it is considered in that committee. That committee authorizes an appropriation, and then what happens? What has the Committee on Appropriations to do if that committee authorizes it and it passes the Senate? We have to provide the appropriation and that is all we can do. I do not see the point the Senator from Oregon makes.

Mr. LENROOT. Going now to the Democratic members of the Committee on Appropriations, I find the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who was just on his feet. Will the Senator from Oregon contend that the Senator from North Carolina would discriminate against agriculture? The next members on the Committee on Appropriations are the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES].

I have gone into this analysis because of the remark made by the Senator from Oregon that great agricultural States or geographical divisions would not be represented, when, as a matter of fact, practically every member of the Committee on Appropriations represents an agricultural State.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, the Senator from Wisconsin is willfully misrepresenting the point which I made. I did not and do not now care to discuss the personnel. They are all in sympathy with the agricultural interests of the country, but I say they are not students of the problem and have not been.

Mr. LENROOT. I beg the Senator's pardon. If he will appeal to the RECORD, he will see that he made the objection that under the proposed change great geographical divisions of the country would not be represented upon the committee.

Mr. McNARY. I repeat, though it would have little to do with the point I am trying to make, that great sections of the country would not perhaps be represented, but the point I tried to make, and I thought the Senator would understand it, is that it is proposed to put the matter in the hands of a committee unfamiliar with the long history of agriculture and horticulture, and to take it away from those who have studied these subjects for years.

Mr. LENROOT. The power of appropriation, but not the power to legislate, which remains with the committee.

Mr. McNARY. A child appreciates that, of course.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad the Senator from Oregon does. When the country is demanding a business administration and the conduct of government in a businesslike way I would regret very greatly to have the Republican side of this Chamber defeat the only proposition there is pending that looks toward making it possible to conduct the Government in somethink like a businesslike fashion.

With reference to the amendment giving ex-officio representation to the committees now having jurisdiction of appropriations other than the Committee on Appropriations, I do appreciate what the Senator from Oregon has said—that members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry do have special knowledge concerning the needs of the department over which that committee has legislative jurisdiction. I do appreciate that, and it is for that reason that the provision with regard to ex-officio members is included in the proposed rule.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation will not be represented on the Committee on Appropriations under this proposed rule, and I know that the power of pungent analysis which the Senator from Wisconsin possesses will at once come to his rescue when he reflects on the situation. Take the question of reclamation, especially the reclamation of the arid and irrigable lands of the West; if a Senator makes himself familiar with that subject, he has done a great work, and he will have no time for any other work. I fail to perceive why the new rule should exclude from the Committee on Appropriations the observation and the experience of members of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. For example, the able Secretary of the Interior sent his report to both the Senate and the House no later than yesterday urging an enormous expansion and development in the matter of irrigation and reclamation.

Adverting to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, I assert that practically every member thereof is an expert on the subject; to my knowledge each has given close attention for years to this important subject. Under the operation of the proposed rule the question of appropriating millions of dollars, aye, hundreds of millions of dollars, would be passed upon by the Committee on Appropriations, and no member of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation would have opportunity to give to the Committee on Appropriations the benefit of his observation and experience unless he happened to be a member of both committees.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator a question right at that point. Does not the Senator realize that that is the rule now under the present situation?

Mr. ASHURST. No.

Mr. LENROOT. The Committee on Appropriations now has jurisdiction in the sundry civil bill over appropriations for that subject.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true, but the initiation of the legislation and the investigation as to the feasibility, suitability, and necessity of particular reclamation legislation is canvassed and investigated by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and not by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LENROOT. It will be the same if the rule is adopted.

Mr. ASHURST. Then why should not the Committee on Appropriations have the benefit of the judgment of the members of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation?

Mr. LENROOT. Have they now?

Mr. ASHURST. They will not have under the proposed rule.

Mr. LENROOT. Have they under existing rules?

Mr. ASHURST. The Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation has plenary power to report a bill carrying an appropriation for any sum that committee may see fit.

Mr. LENROOT. The proposed rule does not deprive the committee of that power.

Mr. ASHURST. Then why should we pass the new rule? If it be useless, why take up the time of the Senate in discussing it?

Mr. LENROOT. This applies to general appropriation bills, as the Senator must be aware. It has nothing to do with the question the Senator raises at all.

Mr. ASHURST. I thought we were engaged in some serious business.

Mr. LENROOT. We are. The Senator knows that there are certain general appropriation bills now that do not go to the Committee on Appropriations, and this rule applies to such bills. There is no general appropriation bill which goes to the Senator's Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. It is not covered by this at all. This takes over the jurisdiction of the committees now having annual appropriation bills, and places that jurisdiction in the Committee on Appropriations under the conditions named in the rule.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator contend that the proposed rule does not change the situation?

Mr. LENROOT. Not with reference to what the Senator speaks of at all.

Mr. ASHURST. I understand, therefore, that it does not change the situation with respect to irrigation. Then, hereafter the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation will be the appropriate committee to hear and determine whether or not the sum of $350,000,000 should be appropriated for irrigation. Will that be the appropriate committee?

Mr. LENROOT. If it is now, it will be in the future. This does not change the rule in that respect at all.

Mr. ASHURST. I want it understood, if the question arises in the future, that not the Committee on Appropriations, but the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, has and shall have the power to hear and determine and to pass upon and report favorably the bill recently introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] appropriating $350,000,000 to drain the swamp lands of the South, irrigate the desert lands of the West, and to reclaim the stump lands of the Northwest. I want it distinctly understood that under this new rule it will be the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and not the Committee on Appropriations. Am I correct about that?

Mr. LENROOT. I wish the Senator to clearly understand my position. If the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation has that power now, they will still have the same power if this proposed rule shall be adopted. The proposed rule will not affect that question one way or the other.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well. The Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation will consider, as it has considered in the past, bills dealing with irrigation and reclamation questions.

Take the Committee on Indian Affairs. I hope Senators will not think that because I happened in an humble way to try to do my duty for six years as chairman of that committee I am therefore seeking service on the Appropriations Committee. Let me call the attention of the keen-minded Senator from Wisconsin to this situation: If there be one bill which might be considered more important than another, it is the bill making appropriations for Indian affairs, because that bill deals with two thousand million dollars worth of trust property. It deals with 300,000 dependents; it deals with 9,000 employees of the Federal Government; it appropriates $12,000,000 annually; it deals with questions of policy, with irrigation, with 150 schools. The members of the Committee on Indian Affairs for years have studied not merely and only the paying out of money, but they have been considering grave questions of policy, for in considering Indian questions we deal with many nations within this great American Nation. With this tribe we may deal in one way and with another tribe we must pursue another kind of policy. If this proposed rule is to operate with celerity—and I ask the Senator's judgment upon my observation—it seems to me that some members of the Committee on Indian Affairs should be permitted to pass on these matters, for I know that during the past 15 years certain members of that committee have given a large part of their time to the consideration of Indian affairs.

Questions of policy respecting Indians are settled on the Indian appropriation bill, although we tried for years to have an Indian legislative bill, but we could not do it. It seems to me, however, that when the questions of policy and the appropriating of the necessary funds to carry out those policies are being considered the chairman, at least, of the Committee on Indian Affairs ought to be ex officio a member of the Appropriations Committee, for I know there is no intellect superb and capacious enough at one sitting of a committee or at a dozen sittings of a committee to grasp a great question of Indian affairs and properly to deal with it. It is a matter of years. It taxes the patience and the ability of keen and sagacious men to arrive at just conclusions regarding Indian affairs, even when they have given the subject years of consideration and study. So if the proposed new rule is to work successfully it ought to provide that when the Interior Department bill is considered by the Appropriations Committee, involving the appropriations for the Bureau of Indian Affairs and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with Indians, at least the chairman of the committee and perhaps other members should be called in as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it may interest the Senator from Arizona to know that the able present chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and the very able ex-chairman of that committee were both members of the subcommittee which had in charge and reported the bill making appropriations for the Indian Service.

Mr. ASHURST. That is a happy circumstance, but it is a circumstance only; but it may also happen that the leading members of the Committee on Indian Affairs at some time in the future may not be on the Appropriations Committee. I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin of the suggestion which I have made.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator's point is well taken, and I would be very glad to vote for an amendment providing that in the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill members of the Committee on Indian Affairs may ex officio be included, as in the case of other appropriating committees.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. I am somewhat embarrassed in my argument here because it so happens that I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and under the proposed rules I suppose I would be the ranking minority member, but I assure the Senator and I assure the Senate that I do not seek nor crave the duty of sitting with the Committee on Appropriations when they consider the Indian appropriation bill. I have tried to do my duty for 10 years, and I feel I ought to have some relief. I am glad, however, to know that the Senator from Wisconsin will support a motion to make members of the Indian Affairs Committee ex officio members of the Appropriations Committee when the latter committee considers the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me, irrigation being a technical subject, it seems to me that, by a parity of reasoning, the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation should have the same opportunity to have a forum where it can present questions of policy.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor, but I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. MCNARY. I think the Senator from Arizona is laboring under a misapprehension as to the meaning of the proposed rule and of the present rule. The pending proposal does not in any way add to or detract from the province or the power of the Reclamation Committee. That committee will still have, as it has had, the authority to authorize appropriations, but the appropriations themselves are always provided by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no further remarks to make, because now I understand that the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation will not have any of the power or authority which it has possessed in the past diminished or reduced in any way.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the proposed new rule that committee will be left just the same as if the rule were not adopted.

Mr. President, I was about to discuss very briefly the desirability of adding ex officio members to the general membership of the Committee on Appropriations. In the first place, the necessity for this rule, aside from its actual merit, is that, with the practice which has been adopted by the House of Representatives, it is absolutely necessary for us to change our rules, for the appropriation bills coming from the House can not be handled under the present rules.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURSUM in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. MCNARY. Of course I am not in sympathy with that argument, because that is an admission, as it seems to me, that the House has the right to dictate to the Senate, a practice which has been common in the past, both in the form of legislation, in its formulation, and in the work of conference committees. In order to obviate the criticism which the Senator is making of the present practice, which he says it is necessary to change, I call his attention to the fact that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has offered a substitute which is designed not to centralize all the power in one committee and yet to meet the very situation which the Senator from Wisconsin is discussing.

I may add that, if it is necessary for all the appropriation bills to be referred to the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and that committee are not anxious to acquire all the power in the Senate, the bills could still be referred to that committee, reported back, and then referred to the appropriate committee which heretofore has had jurisdiction of the particular subject matter, to be considered by that committee and a subcommittee of three members of the Appropriations Committee. That will accord in a measure with the procedure in the House; it will not centralize all the power in one committee and take power away from other committees, and it will give every section of the country a fair opportunity to secure legislation in accordance with the judgment of the Senators coming from the various sections.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, technically and theoretically that might be true; and yet I want to know from the Senator from Oregon or from the Senator from Mississippi when in a short session of Congress we receive an appropriation bill from the House of Representatives about the middle or the last of February how such a plan would work out in a practical way?

Mr. McNARY. I have not seen a short session of Congress for many years, so that I can not answer the question.

Mr. LENROOT. We have them every other year.

Mr. McNARY. I have been here for five years, and I have seen the sessions of Congress go through the hot months of the summer and on until the fall.

Mr. LENROOT. But Congress is required to adjourn every other year on the 4th of March. That is what I have reference to.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that; but we meet in special session and the business of legislation continues during the hot days of summer. At any event, however, that, in my opinion, has no pertinency to the question under discussion. To refer to a particular case, take the rivers and harbors bill, which heretofore has been referred to the Committee on Commerce. That bill, we will say, comes over from the House of Representatives and is referred to the Appropriations Committee, and the next day it is reported back and referred to the Committee on Commerce, to be considered by that committee and three members of the Appropriations Committee. That will not delay the expedition of business for 30 seconds.

Mr. WARREN. But, Mr. President, that simply would mean the disintegration entirely of the Committee on Appropriations, and would avoid completely what we seek to do under the Budget, namely, to have some one place where all appropriation bills may be reviewed so that duplication may be avoided. To accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oregon would simply leave the other committees as they are now and give them more members by cutting the Appropriations Committee into fragments and adding the membership of the Committee on Appropriations to the other committees. That is all that amounts to. I think the Senator who proposed that amendment probably did so more as a joke than with the idea that it should be considered seriously, because it may be plainly seen, if the Senator will read and dissect it, where it would end.

Of course, if the Committee on Appropriations is to be dismissed from its duty, I think it would be a good plan to add its membership to other Committees; perhaps that might be useful; but until that time comes an amendment of the kind suggested should not be entertained.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon made reference in his colloquy with the Senator from Wisconsin of Congress continuing in session during the dog days, and so forth. The Senator probably has given consideration to the question, but to cite an illustration, suppose the Agricultural Committee reported an appropriation here on the 1st of March, and we failed to pass it by the 4th of March, what would become of it?

Mr. McNARY. The answer is obvious. I may say, however, that I can not see where that question has any relevancy in the consideration of the matter now before us.

Mr. OVERMAN. It could not get any hearing; it would not be reported, and consequently would die with the end of the Congress.

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator will let me add a word in answer to the chairman of the committee, it becomes evident to me that he desires to take unto himself more power. There is no purpose upon the part of the author of the substitute, the Senator from Mississippi, to disintegrate the great Appropriations Committee. He simply wants to prevent that committee from being the only committee in the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to contend that these bills could be taken up after the 4th of March, at any time during the dog days or during the summer. A bill dies if it is not acted upon before the 4th of March.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I have not mentioned the dog days, nor the 4th of March, nor the 5th of March, nor the ides of March. I am talking about a principle, and not about any particular date. Of course, we know that bills die with the death of the session; but this amendment of the Senator from Mississippi was offered in good faith, and meets a situation such as has been outlined by the Senator from Wisconsin. It does not impair the efficiency of the power of the Appropriations Committee, but it prevents that committee from taking all the power away from the other committees of the Senate, which I maintain is not fair to these other committees, on account of the study they have given to the various problems affecting their communities; and I can not understand—addressing my remarks to the eminent and able chairman of the Appropriations Committee—why he can expect efficiently and thoroughly to look after every section of the country, and the appropriation of every dollar that goes out.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know what the Senator means by taking away power from some committee and giving it to the Appropriations Committee. What power is taken from the Senator's committee and given to the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. McNARY. Let me give an illustration, if the Senator from Wisconsin will bear with me. He has been very courteous in that regard.

The annual appropriation bill emanating from the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry carries approximately $33,000,000. That committee, composed of 17 members of the Senate selected on account of their familiarity with agricultural problems, has passed upon the various items in the bill, aggregating many hundred in number. All of those members, save the three that go on the Appropriations Committee, are shorn of their power to do what? To see that their communities and the great agricultural interests of the country receive adequate protection and support.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the power? What do you do? You consider the appropriation bill. The estimates are sent down by the Budget Committee. You either give the amount the Budget asked for, or you decrease it, and that is all we can do. If you want to make any extra appropriation about anything else in any other matter, bring in your bill and pass it through the Senate, and we will put it on the appropriation bill. We are bound to put it in when you authorize the appropriation.

Mr. McNARY. You may come in and provide for a total of $20,000,000, leaving the great boll weevil that is raising havoc in the South without any appropriation for its extermination or control because you think it is an idle proposition, because you have not made a study of the great destruction wrought by that pest.

Mr. OVERMAN. It can be considered by us only when it is estimated for.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; but the estimate may be for $3,000,000, and you may not put in 3 cents; whereas the Agricultural Committee, familiar with the destructive forces of that pest——

Mr. OVERMAN. These three men are put on our committee as advisers to tell us what they think about it.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; those three are put there; but again it is like the corporation with one man holding 10 shares and the other fellow holding 90 shares. Where does the fellow with 10 shares get off?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think that is an apt illustration.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I did not suppose that anyone took seriously the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, but evidently the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] does, although I doubt whether the author does. I should like to know, however, because it is very apparent that the Senator has given this amendment study, what is his construction of this amendment? Is a subcommittee of three members of the Committee on Appropriations to act with the full membership of the present appropriating committee, and is that membership finally to pass upon the bill?

Mr. McNARY. My construction is that the bill is brought to the Senate and referred to the Appropriations Committee. It is then referred to the general committee which has had this subject under investigation and has made these appropriations for these many years. The bill is accompanied by a subcommittee of three members of the Committee on Appropriations, sitting in with the general committee which frames up the appropriation bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Sitting with the appropriating committee?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. For instance, the Committee on Commerce. Does the balance of the Appropriations Committee at any time have anything to say about the bill, then?

Mr. McNARY. No; not according to my understanding.

Mr. LENROOT. So if the Senator's construction of this amendment is correct—and perhaps it is—he leaves the situation exactly where it is, except that he gives membership to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. Precisely so. The wisdom of this, it is apparent, lies in the proposition that it gives a certain control to the committees which heretofore have considered the various appropriation bills. It places in the hands of the Appropriations Committee the right to sit in, observe, vote, and report back to the general Committee on Appropriations, and keep track of the expenditures, and in some way attempt to bring about a harmony of action between the various committees of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. But they have no control over the appropriations; so we have the anomalous position of a bill being referred to the Committee on Appropriations and then the Committee on Appropriations being deprived of jurisdiction to act upon it.

Mr. McNARY. Of course that is the situation, and it is to avoid the centralization of all power in the Appropriations Committee. There is where the Senator and I differ widely. I believe that this proposed rule is not in conformity with the principle upon which our country has been built, namely, that every part of the country should have representation on these great committees when these great bills are being considered. The Senator wants to come along and take these bills away from the various committees that heretofore have given great thought and study to these matters and place the power to deal with them in one particular committee. By the Harrison amendment, as I interpret it, the Appropriations Committee would be strengthened by the placing of three of its members on these other committees; but the committees themselves would have that control of the legislation which the fathers who framed the Constitution of the country intended that they should have, and which in the past they have had.

Mr. LENROOT. And the committee to which the bill is referred would have no control over it as a committee?

Mr. McNARY. The Appropriations Committee would not have the exclusive control which the Senator wants it to have and which I do not want it to have.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but they would not have any control over it except as it might be exercised through three of their members?

Mr. McNARY. Why, certainly; and the same thing is true under the plan which the Senator favors. The great Commerce Committee, the Military Affairs Committee, the Naval Affairs Committee, would have no control over the appropriations; but the Senator says to them very sweetly, "Bring in three men and we will let them occupy seats as ex officio members." Instead of trying to kill the various committees, I want to keep them and preserve them intact.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, Mr. President, it is very clear from the construction of the Senator from Oregon that the adoption of this amendment as he construes it would defeat the whole purpose of the Budget system, except as three members of the Committee on Appropriations might attempt to exercise their moral influence upon the present appropriating committee. Of course, both parties have declared for the Budget system. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi is squarely in violation of his own party platform, which pledges the Democratic Party to a Budget system, the appropriation bills of which should be considered by single committees of the House and Senate, and yet the Senator from Mississippi now introduces an amendment that will refer a bill to the Committee on Appropriations, but have it considered and acted upon by some other committee.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator from Wisconsin insist that by putting practically all the power—all as it appertains to appropriations—in the hands of one committee, the Senate is carrying out the Budget system as defined in the platforms of the two great political parties in 1920?

Mr. LENROOT. It is absolutely necessary, and it can not be carried out unless either that is done or we have some budget committee that may have power to dictate to the appropriating committees the gross amount that each shall appropriate. We can not have a Budget system otherwise.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I believe that the latter proposition conforms to the spirit of the platform.

Mr. LENROOT. No; that would not conform to the spirit of the platform. It would conform to the spirit of the Republican platform, but the Democratic platform is explicit in stating that these appropriations should go to a single committee. That is what this rule provides, concurred in by both Republican and Democratic Members; but the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the spokesman of the Democratic Party upon the floor of the Senate, not only advocates in his speech a repudiation of his party pledge but actually offers an amendment to repudiate it.

I want to be very frank with the Senator from Mississippi. He is a very able Senator, and I want to do him the justice to believe that he had forgotten the pledge of his party platform when he made his first speech attacking this rule. I am very hopeful, now that it is called to his attention by the Senator from Wyoming, that he will yield his own individual views, and be one Democratic Senator who will vote to carry out a solemn pledge of his own party, in the councils of which he is one of those upon the inner circle.

Mr. President, to get back again, as I have tried to do several times, to these ex officio members, I said that I recognized the point made by the Senator from Oregon that there are members of these committees now having jurisdiction of appropriations that do have special knowledge of the subjects, and that the Committee on Appropriations ought, in so far as is practicable, to have the benefit of that special knowledge. It will have it under the amendment that is now pending, whereby the chairman and two other members of the committee to be selected by him shall be members of the Appropriations Committee in all matters of appropriation over which his committee now has jurisdiction.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator's argument is that by taking three members of the Agricultural Committee and asking them to occupy three seats in the Appropriations Committee, that will bring to the Appropriations Committee all the knowledge possessed by the 17 members of the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. McNARY. That is certainly the conclusion to be derived from the Senator's statement.

Mr. LENROOT. As the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] just suggests, in addition to these three members there is not an appropriating committee of the Senate—certainly not as far as the larger bills are concerned—whose members do not now have membership upon the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. That does not cover the point.

Mr. LENROOT. It covers the point of representation; so that more than the three members that the Senator speaks of will have special knowledge of the subject over which his own committee has jurisdiction.

Mr. McNARY. I thought the Senator from Wisconsin yielded to my view that certain members of committees had special knowledge which would be of very great use to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. McNARY. Then the Senator said that proposition was covered by taking three members from the Agricultural Committee and placing them on the Appropriations Committee. Then I propound this inquiry: Does the Senator from Wisconsin say that these three members who might be selected would comprehend all the wisdom and all the skill of the 17 members of the Agricultural Committee?

Mr. LENROOT. No; certainly not; and the present members of the Committee on Appropriations on bills over which that committee now has jurisdiction do not comprehend all the knowledge and all the skill of the membership of the Senate—of course not.

Mr. McNARY. May I give the Senator an illustration, because it is most impersonal?

One of the pests for which appropriations are made is the white-pine blister, which affects the pine trees in the Allegheny Mountains. There is one member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry who has made a very long and studious investigation of the control and the treatment of this pest, its behavior, and the best way to exterminate it. That member of the committee is looked upon as an expert, his opinion is widely sought, and his judgment followed. By providing for the appointment of three members of the Committee on Agriculture to represent that committee in drawing up the Agriculture appropriation bill, the knowledge of that member might not be had. It always has been controlling in the Committee on Agriculture. There are others who know about the cattle tick in the South, others who know about the hog cholera and a very great many pests which affect the fruit trees of the West; some who are familiar with the great transportation problems, how fruit and canned goods behave in shipment, each one specializing in a certain field. How can three members of the Committee on Agriculture go over to the Committee on Appropriations without study and without experience and without observation or the opportunity to collect this knowledge or data and represent the Committee on Agriculture, which is composed of 17 Senators? It simply can not be done.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I might have special knowledge upon some subject; I might give it very special study. I might become an expert on that subject, and an appropriation might be very desirable, but I would have no right to ask to be made a member of the Committee on Appropriations, or even of the Committee on Agriculture, because I might have special knowledge of some one particular subject. If the Senator's reasoning is to prevail, instead of this amendment of the rule we ought to make all members of the Senate members of the Committee on Appropriations, because perchance some single Senator might have special knowledge upon some subject calling for an appropriation, and the committee could not get the benefit of his knowledge otherwise.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that is in fact the case now, because every one of the appropriation bills comes before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and every Senator has an opportunity to vote for or against the bill or to offer an amendment to every item.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Oregon is a member of a committee which never has subcommittees to prepare anything for the full committee, I can understand his argument; but if his committee is in the habit of doing as others have done—appoint special subcommittees to prepare special bills and then to bring them before the full committee—he will understand that somewhere we must have the subjects investigated and the bills whipped into shape by a small subcommittee, and the submission of it to the full committee to give it life in the end.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, responding to the proposition of the Senator from Wyoming, the Committee on Agriculture, with the work of which I am more or less cognizant, does not appoint subcommittees.

Mr. WARREN. I did not presume it did, from what the Senator has lately said.

Mr. McNARY. The various items are considered by the whole committee. That committee handles more varieties of subjects than any other committee in the Senate. Each man studies the problems which affect his community and his section of the country, and by the combined judgment of the 17 members we come into a realization of the needs of the country, as expressed in the annual appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Does not the Senator's committee ever appoint subcommittees?

Mr. McNARY. It has not done so since I have been a member.

Mr. WARREN. All I have to say is that most of the committees do that for convenience; but it does not take any power away from the balance of the committee, except that the more laborious work of arranging and placing a bill before the full committee is usually done by a subcommittee.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, there is one complete answer to the point made by the Senator from Oregon, and that is that under the present rules, and as the rules will exist if this amendment is not adopted, if the Committee on Agriculture, when any Agricultural appropriation bill is being considered, be of the opinion that the Committee on Appropriations has failed to make some appropriation which it thinks ought to be made, or has not made an appropriation as large as that committee thinks ought to be made, it can offer an amendment to the appropriation bill.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if that would not be done on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; on the floor or the Senate, with all the prestige of the Committee on Agriculture behind it, if they conclude that the Committee on Appropriations has made some error.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the Senator, who has had very many more years of experience as a legislator than I have had, the number of times a committee making a report to the Senate is overruled by an amendment offered on the floor?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, to be entirely frank with the Senator, when a body of men like the Committee on Agriculture has proposed an amendment to an appropriation bill, making the appropriation greater than that recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, I have seen that amendment prevail much more often than I have seen it defeated, and so has the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I do not recall that I have seen an instance of that particular kind.

Mr. LENROOT. I have, many times.

Mr. McNARY. I do know this to be the practice, that when a committee reports, those who have not been attending pour in through the several doors and follow the committee in its action.

Mr. LENROOT. That is especially true as to appropriation bills; but on the floor of the Senate, if a group of Senators desire an increase in an appropriation, it is much more likely to be adopted than it is to be defeated. Does not the Senator agree with me in that?

Mr. BORAH. If it is limited to an increase.

Mr. LENROOT. That is what I said, if it is limited to an increase.

Mr. BORAH. You can not beat an increase.

Mr. LENROOT. So if at any time the great Committee on Agriculture comes in, and the chairman, by direction of his committee, moves an increase in an appropriation in an agricultural bill, the Committee on Appropriations would not stand very much chance of defending its position on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is a great deal in what the Senator has said. In the illustration he puts, he uses the Agricultural Committee, and I will use that also for the purpose of illustration. If that committee were really in earnest in trying to get an appropriation in an appropriation bill increased, of course that would give it a standing which it would not otherwise get, although without the committee behind it, it might be just as fair and as just; but if it did not have that backing behind it, then what the Senator from Wisconsin has said would be true. It would always be true to a great extent. Senators come in, and not knowing what it is they are called upon to vote on, they follow the committee. I regret that is true, and yet it is natural. I am not complaining of it, because Senators can not always be here to hear the debates, and they go on the theory that the committee has considered the subject and has reported so and so, that they have to guess anyway, and they had better guess with the committee. I think what the Senator has said is often true, not only with relation to appropriation bills, but everything else, and very often it results in bad legislation and injustice.

Mr. LENROOT. I think it is true of appropriation bills. I think it is very seldom that the report of a committee on legislative bills can be overturned, but I can recollect where upon a good many occasions I have tried to sustain the report of the committee against an increase in an appropriation which I did not think was necessary, and I can remember very few cases where the committee was sustained in such instances. Wherever there is a large committee or a substantial group of the Senate which is in favor of an increase, the tendency is to vote for the increase, and the Senator from Nebraska will agree with me that the tendency of the Senate has always been, not toward economy in the way of appropriations, but the plea is always made, as a matter of senatorial courtesy, "Let it go in and go to conference." It goes in, and in a given case, whether it be the Committee on Agriculture or any other committee that desires an increase over that recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, it is more than likely that that increase will be voted into the bill and that the committee will be sustained.

But I have talked longer than I expected to. I want to conclude by saying merely that the Senate is not going to be able to do business in a few weeks, or possibly a few days, unless the rules of the Senate are amended. We can not control the House as to the form their appropriation bills shall take. They have adopted a form of appropriation bill in accordance with the Budget. That is their prerogative. They have a right to send us bills in any form, as they see fit, and when bills come to us under the rules of the Senate they must be referred to some committee, and the bills which will come to us will, under the present rules, deprive some committees of jurisdiction they now have, and they have already done so.

For instance, the Committee on Indian Affairs has already been deprived of its jurisdiction over Indian appropriations, and the Senate has already acted upon that bill.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is now mentioning something which, I think, can not be successfully controverted, and he has illustrated it by citing the case of the Indian Affairs Committee. In my judgment the same reasoning and the same logic which applies to the action of the Senate in taking away the consideration by the Indian Affairs Committee of the Indian appropriation bill applies to every other committee, including the one of which I am chairman, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I would be very glad to have it done with the other committees, just the same as is done with them.

A great many Senators are afraid to do that because they are afraid, as the Senator knows, and as we have heard it expressed so often, of what they deem to be the great power which would be given to the Appropriations Committee, but I do not share in that fear.

I have had this question put up to me, and I would like to put it to the Senator, and I would like to have the Senator from Wyoming listen while I propose it. Why would it not be a good compromise to take these appropriation bills away from all the other committees, and let them go to the Appropriations Committee, as the committee now has them, without adding three members from each of these other committees; and then provide by an amendment to this rule that members of the Appropriations Committee should not be members of any other of the standing committees of the Senate? What would the Senator from Wyoming think of that?

Mr. WARREN. I would have no objection whatever, so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad to hear the Senator say so.

Mr. WARREN. I am perfectly willing at any time to be relieved of service on any other committee, and have asked, and my request is now pending, to be relieved from membership on one committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to hear the Senator say so, and it certainly does him credit. If this additional duty is put upon the shoulders of the Appropriations Committee, what the Senator from Wyoming has said about himself would apply to practically every other member of the Appropriations Committee, who have to divide up into subcommittees, and all of them have all they can do.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the Senator must understand that it would apply more directly to the chairman than it would to the members.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose it would.

Mr. WARREN. The members could better have one or more other committees than the chairman could.

Mr. NORRIS. I am perfectly willing to have that provided. I should have the same rule apply to the chairman of the other standing committees. Let it apply to me the same as to anybody else.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska would be preferable to the present impossible condition with which we are confronted. Of course, the Committee on Military Affairs under the present rules will take jurisdiction of the War Department bill. That committee will pass on appropriations for rivers and harbors. The Commerce Committee will be deprived, under the present rules, of any jurisdiction of bills which carry appropriations when they come from the House.

So that in part the fear expressed by the Senator from Oregon will actually exist without any change of the rules and some committees will be deprived of the jurisdiction they now have. The Senator is a member of the Committee on Commerce with myself. Without any change of the rule the Committee on Commerce will be deprived of any jurisdiction over appropriations for rivers and harbors under the present rules of the Senate. Is it not better to adopt a rule that will give vitality to the Budget rule and make it workable?

My only objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska is that, at least in the beginning of the operation of the new jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, there will be members of the committee who will not have knowledge with reference to the details of certain new bills that the present appropriating committees have, and it is for that reason and that alone that I have been in favor of, for the present at least, putting the chairman and two members of the committee on the Committee on Appropriations, so that the latter committee may have the benefit of their general knowledge of those appropriating bills, and especially of the chairmen of those committees in making up the bills. Later on, if the appropriating committees do have that same knowledge concerning those bills that come to them, then I concede that we might again change the rule so as to give them full and complete jurisdiction, but I think for the present it would be very desirable to add those members as ex officio members—but not for the purpose of getting votes. That thought never occurred to my mind in supporting the matter, but only for the purpose of securing better bills.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am afraid that I made a mistake in intimating that it was put in for the purpose of getting votes. I did not mean that in any offensive sense. I know that Senators are jealous of their powers, and naturally so, on the various committees, and we find that every day when something comes up which takes away from a committee any power or authority, the members of that committee are all fighting to prevent it. I did not mean it in any offensive sense or in any critical sense. Still I have no doubt that that had something to do with this and something to do with the change of the rule in the House. In other words, it left a portion of the jurisdiction of the committee which it heretofore had and did not take it all away.

There is something in the Senator's suggestion that has been made before during the debate, that for a time at least the Appropriations Committee may be able to get a great deal of light from members of the other committees. If that be true, and I think it is, and if that be the reason for adding this to the rule, then would the Senator favor an amendment that would limit this portion of the rule to the end of the Sixty-eighth Congress, or something of that kind?

Mr. LENROOT. Personally I have no objection, although I think that can be done later just as well as now.

Mr. NORRIS. It will be pretty difficult to do it later. We had better do it now if we are going to do it at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I apologize for having occupied so much of the time of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKinley	Simmons
Ball	Harris	McNary	Smith
Brandegee	Harrison	New	Spencer
Bursum	Heflin	Newberry	Stanfield
Calder	Johnson	Nicholson	Sterling
Cameron	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Wadsworth
Caraway	Kellogg	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Culberson	Kendrick	Pepper	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	Keyes	Phipps	Warren
Curtis	King	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Ernst	Ladd	Pomerene	Watson, Ind.
Fernald	Lenroot	Reed	Weller
France	Lodge	Robinson	Willis
Glass	McCormick	Sheppard
Gooding	McKellar	Shields

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the committee amendment.

CONSTRUCTION OF BOULDER CANYON DAM (S. DOC. NO. 142).

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there has been filed a very important report from the Secretary of the Interior addressed to the President of the Senate, which deals with the Boulder Canyon Dam conference held at the U. S. Grant Hotel, San Diego, Calif., December 12, 1921, relative to the construction of the Boulder Canyon Dam, in which Arizona, New Mexico, California, and other States are interested. It is in the form of a typewritten report from the Secretary of the Interior. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BRIG. GEN. JOHN H. RUSSELL—AFFAIRS IN HAITI (S. DOC. NO. 143).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1922.

To the SENATE:

In response to your resolution of February 23, requesting a copy of any order, commission, or other authorization issued by me or under my direction to Brig. Gen. John H. Russell authorizing him to act for or on behalf of the Government of the United States in Haiti, with a copy of any instructions, etc., I am inclosing herewith a copy of the commission issued to Gen. Russell. I trust the information conveyed in the copy of the commission will satisfactorily convey such information as the Senate desires, because I very respectfully submit that it would not be compatible with the public interest to make public the specific instructions under which he is charged with the performance of his duties as the American high commissioner.

Very respectfully,

WARREN G. HARDING.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the Secretary may read the paper which accompanies the message of the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Warren G. Harding, President of the United States of America.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye, that reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity and ability of Brig. Gen. John H. Russell, United States Marine Corps, I do appoint him high commissioner, with the rank of ambassador extraordinary, to represent the President of the United States in Haiti for the purpose of investigating, reporting upon, and supervising the performance of their duties by the officers nominated by the President of the United States and appointed by the President of Haiti pursuant to the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Haiti, signed at Port au Prince September 16, 1915, in order that the purposes of said treaty may be fully accomplished.

In testimony whereof I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, this 11th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1922 and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and forty-sixth.

[SEAL.] WARREN G. HARDING.

By the President:

CHARLES E. HUGHES,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message and accompanying paper will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed.

RAILROAD RATES ON SUGAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution 246, transcripts of the testimony before the commission in the matter of application 8835, filed by R. H. Countiss, agent, for relief from provisions of the fourth section of the amended commerce act in connection with rates on beet and cane sugar, carloads, from San Francisco, Crockett, and other producing points in California to Chicago and common points, which with the accompanying papers was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PROMOTION OF MAJ. ROBERT G. PECK.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on the 26th day of September, 1918, the most desperate battle of the European war was being fought. The German Army was standing at bay. Its advance troops were armed with machine guns, with poison gas, with flaming liquids. These troops were protected by the drum fire of innumerable cannon, hurling every variety of deadly missile into the ranks of the advancing American troops. Nothing that human ingenuity could devise, nothing that scientific skill could produce to work the destruction of men, had been omitted by the masters of the German forces. The charges at Gettysburg, at Waterloo, at Austerlitz, and at Lodi were almost pacific compared with the desperate enterprise upon which the khaki-clad youths of the United States were on this eventful day obliged to embark. For four days they remained the victims of all the frightful carnage visited upon them by a great and courageous enemy; for four days they held to their trenches, charged over the bloody plains, crawled upon their bellies, dug in, drove back the enemy, and continued to advance. Never for one moment was there a wavering in the assault. Men died, but did not retreat; men fell exhausted, rose from the ground, and toiled on against the enemy. At the end of that time nature was exhausted; the ranks had been decimated; the bodies of the dead were strewn upon the field; the dying were everywhere. Famished, desperate, staggering, these troops, who had gone steadily to the front, at the command of their officers were recalled for rest in order that they might be ready for a future fray. They came from their trenches covered with blood, besmeared with mire, staggering from exhaustion, a body of men as heroic as were those who fought at Thermopylæ, as Spartan as were those who died on American soil in the celebrated battle between the Mexicans and the Texans, when the last man gave up his life in the Alamo. As they passed along an officer stepped from a well-polished limousine.

His boots had been recently rubbed and oiled and polished by a lackey; his uniform was in excellent condition; he had been burnished like a brass railing. He had not been within gunshot; the smoke of battle was not upon his immaculate garments. He viewed the staggering hosts of heroes as they retired for rest. He saw that some of the officers who had stood by these boys in the trenches, who had been sustained by their courage, and in turn had given back courage to their men, who for four days lived in the very mouth of a seething hell, looking into the face of death, were talking to their men, cheering them on, fraternizing with them, treating them as human beings, treating them as they ought to have been treated by American officers in command of American freemen. He thereupon wrote the following report upon the Thirty-fifth Division of the National Army:

> The division has all the earmarks of a National Guard unit, which it is. The National Guard attitude which now permeates the various units must be gotten rid of. The division needs the elimination of the old type National Guard officer. There is entirely too much familiarity between the officers and the enlisted men.

It was a gratuitous and uncalled-for insult to the men of the Thirty-fifth Division, to every volunteer soldier of the Army. It was an insult to the military profession; it was a disgrace to the American Army.

He criticizes the marching order of men staggering from exhaustion; he criticizes the condition of the clothing of men who had stood in trenches filled with mud and who had marched and crawled across terrain plowed and furrowed by cannon shot and shell. He criticizes the attitude of officers who had come from homes where the boys under their command were their neighbors and their neighbors' sons. He treated with contumely and scorn those who ought to have had their brows wreathed with laurels and whose breasts should have been decorated with the insignia of courage.

His name was once sent to the Senate for confirmation, and the nomination was rejected. I shall not discuss the present appointment, but I shall discuss the man and his methods. Let a soldier speak—a free man of America, a sovereign citizen, a taxpayer who must contribute to the support of the Army and to the salaries of Army officers; a man whose profession and business are not arms but the arts of peace, yet who nevertheless willingly went to the front as did millions of other American citizens. I will now read from an article which was written to a Chicago newspaper, and which is entitled "The Voice of the People":

> Since you have devoted so much space to the defense of Maj. R. G. Peck, of the Regular Army, relative to his criticism of the Thirty-fifth Division, won't you let the division's side of the case be known? I was a member of the One hundred and fortieth Infantry, of the Thirty-fifth, and am thoroughly familiar with the facts in dispute.
> Maj. Peck (then lieutenant colonel) chose to inspect us as we were on our way out of the Argonne, after suffering more than 7,000 casualties in a week of some of the hardest fighting of the war. He rolled up in his Cadillac limousine (out of reach of the big guns) and cast his eye upon us as we marched—no; staggered—by, dirty, lousy, ragged, mud-bespattered, equipment short, hungry, weak, and exhausted—well, anyway, comes the inspector to give us the eagle eye. And, ah, what did he find? Our clothes were torn. Our shoes were muddy. And—horrors! We weren't shaved! Worse still, our rifles had specks of rust on 'em. And the men didn't march with much snap and didn't keep very good ranks. Right. Most of them were doing damned good to stay there at all. And once in a while one of them would tumble on his face. That, we learned from Mr. Peck, was straggling.
> Some of our wagons were overloaded—due to the fact that we were short only 3,000 horses. Worse still, our officers were detected talking to enlisted men as though the latter were really human beings. Some owed their lives to these enlisted men. He found also that officers were not stationed at proper intervals through the column. One of our battalions came out with one lone second louie still functioning. Now, how in—well, you know what I mean.
> Now, here's the rub: In his entire report never once did Maj. Peck make one solitary mention of the fact that we were just then walking away from the battle field. Even Maj. Gen. Traub (Regular Army), of the Thirty-fifth, stated in his reply to Peck that he "regretted the inspector did not state the true facts."
>
> Let us peruse the facts: The Thirty-fifth lost more than 7,000 men in six days. More than 60 per cent of its officers were casualties. More than 50 per cent of its infantry was killed or wounded. It advanced 12 kilometers over hills and valleys against strong defenses, and when it stopped it had driven deeper into the German lines than any division on its front. Records will prove that.
> Why were many of the veteran National Guard officers removed on the eve of the battle and replaced by unknown Regular Army officers? Does anyone know that many, if not a large majority, of higher commands in the division which "bore all earmarks of being a National Guard outfit" were held by Regular Army officers during the Argonne? Why was the Infantry ordered forward day after day against murderous artillery and machine-gun fire with virtually little or no artillery support, since the guns could not be moved up owing to bad roads and lack of horses? Why, on the second day, was the Infantry forced to lie under a terrific barrage from dawn until 5.30 p. m. waiting for tanks and artillery support, when both had been asked for early that morning? Why, on the fourth day, was the Infantry, with still little or no artillery support, ordered to advance when we were then in a salient and were being fired on from all sides except the rear? Why, after taking the town of Exermont on that day at a cost of fully 500 men killed and wounded, was the Infantry ordered to withdraw from it after holding it for a day? (The First Division, which relieved us, did not retake Exermont for four days, and then did it with scores of heavy guns aiding.
> The First lost 9,000 men after relieving us. Yet they were not inspected and insulted when they left the battle field.
> Perhaps some one did "blunder" in the Thirty-fifth. But methinks the errors bear a distinct Regular Army flavor.
> JOHN W. KEYS.

Mr. President, I have many letters and telegrams similar in their spirit to the one I have just read.

The Thirty-fifth Division was composed almost exclusively of Missouri and Kansas troops. The man who challenges their courage, the man who challenges their loyalty, would be willing to challenge the loyalty of Napoleon's guard. These men belonged to the militia, and if we had possessed no militia we would have been in a desperate condition even in our once threatened conflict with Mexico. It is no part of my purpose to reflect on the Regular Army; but the Regular Army never has defended this country, and never can defend this country. They have never fought any war, and they never will fight any war, for the simple reason that there are not enough of them. The National Guard has been the backbone of our defense and our offense, and it must be the main reliance until some entirely new system of military defense is devised.

If I recall rightly, 17 divisions of the National Guard were on the fighting line before there were over 7 divisions of the Regulars there. If the National Guard does not represent American manhood and American chivalry, then it is not represented in the Army. These National Guard organizations, as everyone knows, are recruited from the ranks of young men in the various districts of the United States. They come from the farm, the factory, the countinghouse. They are typical of our citizenship. They are officered by men who have seen fit to devote a large part of their time to the public service, practically without money and without pay. They have been held together for years when Congress has made inadequate appropriations and State governments have been equally neglectful. In many instances in years past the officers out of their own pockets, or the men out of their pockets, have sustained the headquarters and the upkeep of regiments to a very large extent.

When the call came to arms in this great conflict, the response of the National Guard was one of the bright and splendid manifestations of American patriotism. They were called into the Army as a body. When it was known that the war was coming, men crowded into the ranks, companies were recruited to the full limit, regiments found themselves overwhelmed with applications, and these boys went out under the command of officers whom they knew, who knew them, and who loved them. There was no flinching. There was no holding back. In almost every instance the regiments were ready to move before the Federal Government could supply the trains to carry them to concentration camps. They went across the sea under their own officers. They endured the fatigues of the march, the hardships of the camps, and the horrors of the battle field with uncomplaining lips. They held their ground when both wings of the Army fell back. Their officers, I unhesitatingly say, were grossly mistreated in many instances.

The general who had organized and brought the Thirty-fifth Division to a state of perfection was displaced without reason and without cause, and a man in every way inferior to him was placed in command. Their company officers were taken from them in many instances, regulars with whom they had no acquaintance were placed over them upon the very eve of battle, and still the enlisted men went forward and did not complain. When they had stood until their ranks were thinned, until nature could no longer sustain their bodies, with spirits undaunted, with eyes still blazing the light of battle, they obeyed the order to retire in order that they might rest and renew the strife. And as they came out of the flaming vortex they were insulted by Maj. Peck.

Under similar circumstances French officers would have stood to congratulate the ragged, muddy horde of heroes. They would have pinned decorations upon them. They would have cited them for gallantry in their general orders. They would have inspired them by that recognition which a just Government invariably gives to men who have sacrificed in its behalf. But on the road from the front we find a Regular Army officer, in shining leather and epaulets, who looked at these men who had suffered where he had not suffered, who had toiled where he had not toiled, who had endured where he had not endured, who had bled where he had not bled. That gentleman was posted on the highway to sneer at these men as they went by, and it is now proposed that we shall promote that gentleman.

The posture of that immaculate major has its precedent. The breed was known 300 years ago, as Shakespeare's lines attest. Indeed, Hotspur might be some Missouri sergeant or lieutenant speaking in just indignation in his own defense:

> "I remember, when the fight was done,
> When I was dry with rage and extreme toil,
> Breathless and faint, leaning upon my sword,
> Came there a certain lord, neat and trimly dress'd
> Fresh as a bridegroom; and his chin new reap'd
> Show'd like a stubble-land at harvest-home;
> Perfumed like a milliner;
> * * * * *

"The officers actually talked with their men!" God in heaven—and I say it reverently—will we ever be able in this world to drive out of the hearts and souls of our people the idea of distinction and class?

Who was this man in the uniform of the Army? A boy born of ordinary parents, I presume in the ordinary way; educated, I assume, no better than the ordinary boy. I think his history is that he himself entered the Army as a private, graduated from the ranks to become a second lieutenant, and then, of course, promotions were very rapid after the war began. What was there about this gentleman to make it pollution for his aristocratic lips to speak to an American boy who had been putting his body between the enemy and his country? But, of course, he did not commit that offense. You could not imagine Maj. Peck talking to an enlisted man. But others did talk with their men. That was done by the captain of a company organized in some little town, a company composed of his neighbor boys, sons of parents as good as there were anywhere, honorable folk, boys whose mothers gave them to their country and choked back the tears as they gave them, that the sons might go forth with Spartan courage.

They were the sons of fathers some of whom were only farmers, some of them only laboring men, some of them only ministers, some of them only lawyers, some of them only bankers, but all of them were loyal American citizens, and every boy who went forth and took enlistment under that officer, selected in the town, went forth because he was willing to pour out his heart's blood in order that the flag might float with undimmed glory and the honor of the United States remain without a blot.

The captain knew them and knew their parents, knew their mothers, and knew their sisters, and as he saw one of them stagger as he went along, or even if he saw fit without so good a cause, he spoke a word to him. The captain happened to have epaulets upon his shoulders, the private had none; and because the captain spoke to this American citizen, willing to die for his country, this American citizen who was walking out of the jaws of death and the bowels of hell, where he had stood for four days, that was the subject for reprimand by Maj. Peck.

Whence come these ideas which we find in the Army and which have been its curse from the first, a system which is un-American, which, in my judgment, has reduced the Regular Army officer to about one-third of the efficiency he would have possessed under a different system? Whence comes that system, I inquire? It was born in Prussia, about the seventeenth century, at a time when that country had not advanced to anything like the degree of civilization it afterwards attained. It was based upon the idea that the king was the master, that the people were servants; that the king, or the master, had the right to command men to their death; that monarchs were the sole source of authority; and that he who would not serve should be made to serve.

Hence grew up the idea that the spirits of men must be broken; that they should be so treated and so trained until they possessed no souls of their own; that they should be transformed into automatons, obeying the will of one master. It was a system which might have been, not tolerable, but which might have had some reason back of it in those days, and those times, and in that civilization. When you apply that, sirs, to the independent citizenry of this country you destroy the Army and you take away that spirit which must exist in every army if it is made effective.

It is high time that this fact should be recognized, that any officer who is so poor and pitiable and miserable a creature that he can only sustain his dignity by refusing to speak to a private has no dignity to sustain and no position to lose; that any officer who is a real officer is a big enough man to speak to anybody, at any time, under any circumstances. But better than that, we must recognize the fact that an American Army called in defense of its country is an army of citizens, and that the citizen does not lose his manhood when he puts on the uniform of his country; that, of course, he must obey proper commands, and every citizen is willing to do that; outside of the mere observance of the necessary rules, that he shall be treated as a free man ought to be treated, as a citizen ought to be treated.

Mr. President, a man who had a dog engaged in his defense, an honest dog that fought for his life, would pet him, would love him, would make a companion of him. But here is a gentleman who says to the officer whose life perhaps was saved by the gallantry of some private soldier, "You are to be reprimanded because you put your hands upon the shoulder of that boy as he staggered from weakness, marching from the battle's ghastly front."

A second time this name comes here. I protest in the name of the Thirty-fifth Division. I claim for it no better record than the records that were made by the other gallant troops who went from America to defend America's honor, for all of them fought with heroic courage, all of them served with distinction, and in what I am about to say I pluck no blossom from the wreath which will forever be fresh and glorious upon the pages of their story.

When I say that the Missouri troops and the Kansas troops were as brave as the bravest, as good as the best, I state the plain and simple truth. There is not a page of history that I have ever read that tells the story of Missouri regiments playing the coward in any war. Missourians marched with Doniphan across the plains when it was a trackless desert. They fought battle after battle against superior numbers. They made, it is said, the most remarkable military expedition in the history of the world. In the Civil War, when our people were divided, Missouri sent into the Federal Army more troops than were required of her by the Federal Government, and then sent into the Confederate Army more troops than were called for as Missouri's quota on the Confederate side.

I know the officers who went out with the Thirty-fifth Division, some of them men who were making $10,000 and $20,000 a year in their business and profession, who willingly laid it down, who brought to the business of the war their training as experts in civil life and a long preparatory training as officers of the guard; men who had passed their examination with distinction; men who so treated their troops that there was not a man who would not have followed them into the grave itself. They sometimes talked to their men; they always treated them as human beings. If Maj. Peck was in command of Missouri troops very long, he would either talk to them or they would talk to him. It ought to be so of the troops of every State.

This snobbery of the Army, this miserable self-exaltation, this aristocracy of West Point, this spirit that leads men to think that because they have been educated at Government expense and a uniform put upon their backs they are thereby transmuted into a finer clay, is the intolerable thing in the Army. I am told that this gentleman did not come from the school, but he imbibed its worst spirit; he stands as its worst exhibit.

What is in the heart of a man who can do these things? Imagine Robert E. Lee or Gen. Grant standing and criticising and maligning his troops as they returned from a desperate battle. What those real military commanders wanted was men who when they were on the fighting line knew how to advance and how to hold the line. They were not so much interested in whether their shoes were blacked when they tramped back off the battle field as whether the toes of their shoes pointed toward the enemy when the order came to advance. I think it was at Lookout Mountain that a Regular Army officer said to the commander of a regiment of Volunteers who were sweeping up the heights, firing and cheering and advancing, going on even without command, "Your line is irregular, Colonel"; and the colonel said, "Yes; but they are fighting like hell."

To advance this man is an insult to the volunteer soldier. They have protested and protested. Men standing upon wooden legs have protested. Men with arms shot away have protested. Men with their lungs burned out by poison gases have protested. It is the universal protest of all the men of that great division, of all who are living, and if they could speak I am sure it would be the universal voice of the 7,000 dead.

"There is entirely too much familiarity between the officers and the enlisted men," said this distinguished major. Some things make us familiar. It never was my lot to stand upon the battle front. I do not know whether I would have the courage to stand there or not. I hope I would; but no one knows until he has been tried. But it does seem to me, whether it is a sergeant or a lieutenant or a captain who is out there with the shells bursting all around, with the air filled with smoke, with the roar and din of perdition beating into your ears, with boys whom you knew and loved falling dead by your side, that somehow or other you would forget about your caste and about the bars on your shoulders, and you would think of the big, rugged fellow who touched elbows with you and stood with firm nerves firing the machine gun or firing the rifle or with fixed bayonet driving back an oncoming foe. It seems to me the companionship of danger and the brotherhood of death would bring you together, and that as you walked out, realizing that for the time being you were safe, you would feel like putting your hand on that fellow's shoulder and saying at least, "I am glad you are safe. You did well." But do not do it if you are in command of volunteer troops. There may be some gentleman over yonder, who never smelled gunpowder in battle, who will say, "You are too familiar with this boy who stood with you foot to foot and elbow to elbow fighting, fighting, while all about the dead and dying lay. Do not do it. It is too familiar."

And if, as you march out, some boy, whose mother you knew and who gave him in your care, weak, hungry, exhausted, staggers, and is about to fall, do not say to him, "Brace up my boy. A little bit farther and we will have rest." Above all things do not say to him, "You have done well; you have been a gallant lad." Do not say that. It is too familiar. Maj. Peck might hear you. Do not say to this other boy who is coughing up his lungs, who knows even as he gasps for breath where poison has burned away the vitals, that he has only a few hours perhaps to live, but whose gallantry takes him staggering back to camp—do not say to him, "My boy, you have done well." Maj. Peck might see you speaking to him, and you will be too familiar.

Why let this insult be put upon the thousands of men in this great division? Why should their universal voice not be heeded? Why should their unanimous protest be spat upon? Are their feelings to have no consideration? Are we to think only of the debonair gentleman with the spotless boots who that morning stood and sneered while they staggered by? The lesson ought to be taught now and for all time that Army officers can not accuse men without being held accountable at least in the matter of promotion.

Books could be written about the conduct of this gallant division, books that would disparage not one whit the luster of other divisions. I say that it is my opinion that this single division in the battle of the Argonne alone performed deeds which, had they been done in days of the past, would have been embalmed in history and glorified in song, so that we would have regarded them as unexampled heroes.

I protest, sir, in their name against this thing that is sought to be done. I protest because it is unjust; it is an insult to the National Guard; it is an insult to the men of the ranks and to the officers, who have now returned to the walks of peace and who are keeping up the old organization, rebuilding it and making it stronger and better for the future.

Mr. President, I could discuss this question at very great length; I could read from the stories of this division; but if what I have said is without effect, then nothing I might be able to say would be of any force. I regret that this appointment is again sent to the Senate. One rejection ought to have been enough. Let this man, if he does not like his present position in the Army, do what the National Guard officers have done—go out in the world and earn a living for himself. They had to do that. They are not whining around about promotion. They went back to work to their places of business. I apprehend that if this great officer shall go out and embark in the ordinary business of the world he will find himself matched intellectually, morally, physically, in business ability, and in every way by many of the very privates he sneered at as those privates marched out from the field of glory to the field of insult.

This man should have been tried by court-martial for the report he made; he should have been cashiered and dismissed the Army for the report he made. Instead of that he is brought here for promotion over other and better men.

Mr. President, I warn the Congress of the United States, I warn every man who is charged with a governmental duty at this time, that if they expect to maintain a spirit in our people that will always respond when the country is in need, they should see to it that every man who mistreats a volunteer soldier of America shall be punished, not rewarded.

That is all I now desire to say on this question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Missouri has seen fit to discuss this case in open session. The Senator from Missouri is the master of his own tactics; I shall make no comment upon them.

The gross unfairness of the situation may be apparent when I say—and I think I have a right to say it without violating the rules of the Senate—that a large volume of testimony on this most extraordinary case was taken by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, and one of the most—if not, in fact, the most—important witness before that committee was the officer to whom the Senator from Missouri has referred in such scathing terms, and who is helpless in defense of himself at this hour.

That testimony, Mr. President, was taken, in accordance with the rules of the Senate, in executive session. It covers the whole story of this incident in the most exhaustive fashion. Such portions of it as the Senator from Missouri has referred to constitute but one-tenth of the story. As the result of that testimony taken by a committee of the Senate, I think, endowed with the average intelligence of Senators, and with as high a regard for the soldiers of the Army as any other group of men, by a most substantial majority the action with which the Senator from Missouri is familiar was taken by that committee the last time this matter came up. I am precluded by the rules of the Senate from reading from that testimony. I shall not violate the rules of the Senate. I feel a moral obligation to abide by them, even though in doing so a comparatively defenseless individual is subjected to attack in public.

There is, however, one point, Mr. President, to which the Senator from Missouri has referred, and that is the nomination of this officer for promotion a second time by the President of the United States. I gather from his remarks that he criticizes the Executive for sending in the nomination a second time. The Senator from Missouri apparently does not realize that the President has no discretion in the matter. The law is mandatory. The name must be sent in whenever a vacancy in the grade above that of major occurs and when the officer in question is the senior major. That is why the nomination has been made; that is the only reason, the compelling and controlling reason, for the nomination having been made. The nomination was made in accordance with the statute, and no reflection can lie against the President or the Secretary of War or any other official of the Government for it having been sent here a second time.

Mr. President, the Senate will settle this question in executive session, and it will settle it in accordance with its convictions and in accordance with the facts which have been elicited in the testimony gathered by a committee of the Senate, which sets forth facts which have not been related here to-day and which can not be related. For one, Mr. President, I am satisfied, with this brief statement, to leave the matter as it is.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, by innuendo at least, if not by direct statement, the Senator from New York criticizes me for discussing in public what he claims can only be properly discussed in executive session. My conception of the rule is that appointments are considered in executive session when we come to vote upon them for the purpose of protecting the secrecy of the vote and for the purpose of permitting any Senator who chooses to speak in private to speak in private, but that when any matter comes to the Senate, unless the matter itself be secret, so that there can be no reference to it, it is then a public question which any Senator may discuss in open session if he so desires. If a treaty were sent here secretly, until it was released I could not discuss the terms of the treaty, because I would be exposing that which is confidential.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. When a nomination is sent here, however, it is a matter sent in open session; it is reported in open session and recorded in the RECORD, and that nomination I have the right to discuss because it is open. I can not use the testimony given in executive session, but I can use any fact which comes to my knowledge from whatsoever source I can get it, including in this case the order. The only things I have commented on are excerpts from the order, which is part of the Army records, and therefore open to me or any other Senator. I carefully abstained fom reading from the confidential testimony. I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I merely have this observation to make, that the last statement of the Senator from Missouri illustrates the unfairness of the situation, because it is in the testimony that the defense lies.

Mr. REED. Now I come to the question of unfairness; it is my next point. There is a way to make this so fair that even the Senator from New York, though a member of the Military Affairs Committee, can not err therein, and that is to proceed to the consideration of this question in open executive session, and in a moment, Mr. President, I shall make that motion.

The Senator states that Maj. Peck is being attacked; that he is helpless and without defense. He is no more helpless than the men of the Thirty-fifth Division were when he attacked them. Moreover, he seems to be here with very competent defense in the person of the Senator from New York. He says that Maj. Peck is being attacked in public; but Maj. Peck's order reflecting upon the Thirty-fifth Division was made in public, and these thousands of men had no one to speak for them.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the appointment of Maj. Peck in open executive session, so that he will be allowed all the benefits of this defense.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask what, under those circumstances, would become of the pending business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to amend the resolution now before the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, irrespective of what is before the Senate at this time, the Senate has a well-defined rule of practice in a matter of this kind that the testimony shall be regarded as confidential; and in spite of the fact that this officer for the moment suffers under a very grave handicap as the result in part, at least, of the publicity of the criticism against him, I do not myself believe that the Senate should abandon its practice.

This does not affect alone the officer whose nomination for promotion to the grade of lieutenant colonel is pending before the Senate. It affects many, many other officers and men; and some of the statements which of necessity must be made in order to portray the entire truth will be most embarrassing and painful if made in open session, and no good will come of it.

The ends of justice and fair dealing will be attained, I am sure, by the Senate proceeding under its usual practice. If we are to abandon the practice and discuss all these matters in open executive session, we might as well abandon it for good on all similar matters. I can see no distinction in some respects, at least, between this case and others which may come up in the future and cases which most assuredly have come up in the past.

So, Mr. President, in spite of the situation which I referred to a moment ago in my very brief statement following the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, I shall object to taking up this matter in open executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I regret that my very good friend the distinguished Senator from New York deprives Maj. Peck of the benefit of this evidence and of publicity. I regret that he takes that position, particularly since he has claimed that I have not fairly stated the case. The reason he advances is, however, the same reason that we have heard with reference to every case where we have sought to have an open executive session. We were told some time back that if treaties were considered in open executive session all sorts of deplorable things would be said which would be offensive to foreign governments; but we finally came to the doctrine of considering most of the treaties in open executive session, and we are now engaged in so considering five of them.

The Senator speaks of reflections upon other Army officers. I take it that no one will reflect upon another Army officer, aside from Maj. Peck, unless that Army officer has been guilty of conduct that brings its own condemnation. There is nothing in the evidence that I have read that reflects upon other Army officers. If there is, it is sworn testimony. I have looked through the parts that I thought applied to Maj. Peck.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to submit another request for unanimous consent, and that is that the seal of secrecy be removed from the evidence in the Peck case, and that it shall be made public.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I object to any such suggestion until after the case is settled in executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, why should there be objection until after the case is settled?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the usual course of procedure, as the Senator knows.

Mr. REED. If it is proper to give it out after the case is settled, then it certainly is proper to give it out now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator knows perfectly well that in very many of these matters, when the cases have been closed, the motion has been made that thereafter the seal of secrecy should be removed.

Mr. REED. I can see no reason for that rule, and I never have known it to obtain as a rule. It has been sometimes done that way, and sometimes the seal has been removed in advance. There is no use in removing the seal of secrecy after the decision has been rendered unless it be feared that if the facts are known in advance of the decision public opinion might manifest itself, and might affect the decision; in other words, that if the Senate can vote here in secret without the public knowing what the facts are it may vote one way, but if the public does know what the facts are the Senate may vote the other way. That has not been my conception of what the Senate would do.

Mr. President, having failed in both of these requests, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the nomination of Maj. Peck in open executive session; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	Myers	Sheppard
Ball	Heflin	Nelson	Shortridge
Brandegee	Johnson	New	Simmons
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Smith
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Spencer
Capper	Kendrick	Oddie	Stanfield
Caraway	Keyes	Overman	Stanley
Culberson	King	Page	Sutherland
Cummins	Ladd	Pepper	Wadsworth
Fernald	Lenroot	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	Lodge	Poindexter	Warren
Glass	McKellar	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Hale	McKinley	Rawson	Weller
Harreld	McNary	Reed	Willis
Harris	Moses	Robinson

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is unavoidably absent on account of serious illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] are in attendance at a hearing before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the motion made by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I call the attention of the Chair to the second paragraph of Rule XXXVIII, which reads:

All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret.

That is the rule of the Senate, and the consideration of this nomination in open executive session can not be had unless the rule itself is suspended.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is another rule with regard to this matter to which I wish to call attention. I refer to paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVI, which reads:

When acting upon confidential or executive business, unless the same shall be considered in open executive session, the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons—

And so forth.

Paragraph 3 of that rule reads:

All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Senators and the officers of the Senate kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy, or unless the same shall be considered in open executive session.

Mr. LODGE. That rule applies only to treaties.

Mr. REED. It is perfectly clear that paragraph 2 and paragraph 3 embrace all executive business taken together. Each provides specifically for the matter being considered in open executive session. That is all I desire to say on it. It has been the general practice in the Senate for years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not seem to the Chair to be exactly clear whether paragraphs 2 and 3 of Rule XXXVI apply exclusively to treaties. The implication would seem to be that they do; but whether they do or not, paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVIII seems to be conclusive in the statement that—

All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret.

That would seem to control, and the point of order would seem to be well taken.

Mr. REED. That construction would resolve itself into this, that there could be no open executive sessions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I observe that it could not be held to consider nominations in open executive session unless the rule were changed or suspended?

Mr. REED. That is the opinion of the Senator, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think this question was before the Senate during the last Congress. I remember I had formed a decided opinion on it, and the Senate overruled me, as I remember it now. It seems to me plain, if I may be permitted to have the attention of the Chair for a moment, that paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVI applies to any executive business. It provides that—

When acting upon confidential or executive business—

Considering nominations is executive business, as I understand it, the same as acting on treaties—unless the same shall be considered in open executive session.

In the first place, Mr. President, if acting on nominations is executive business, then section 2 of Rule XXXVI applies; and if it applies, the parenthetical clause, "unless the same shall be considered in open executive session," is absolutely meaningless, unless a nomination can be considered in open executive session.

That would apparently be perfectly plain, and there would be no difficulty about reaching that construction of the language, as I look at it, if it were not for the language which has been cited to the Chair contained in paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVIII respecting executive sessions, and in my judgment it applies to them where it is secret, and where it is secret then section 2 of that rule applies. That sort of a construction of each one of these clauses would give effect to both provisions of the rule, and any court in construing any instrument would, if it could, without abuse of the English language or shocking the sensibilities of construction, give effect to the entire instrument.

So, while it is not entirely clear, and there seems to be somewhat of a conflict, that construction will be borne out, I think, by the language used, and the apparent conflict between those provisions of the rule will be cleared up. It seems to me, therefore, that it is in order to make a motion to consider a nomination in open executive session.

Another reason why that would appear to be the proper construction is that it is, in my judgment, the reasonable construction to be put upon the language. Any other construction would mean that the Senate was absolutely bound to consider every nomination in secret session; that it has no right to open the doors.

It is suggested that the rules be suspended; but that would require a day's notice and a two-thirds vote. That construction, therefore, would tie the hands of the Senate, and is one which should not be resorted to, it seems to me, unless we are driven to it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a clause on page 247 of the Precedents by Gilfry, as follows:

There is no inflexible rule requiring that confidential or executive business shall be considered with closed doors, and, since the adoption of the amendments to Rules XXXVI and XXXVII proposed by Senator Aldrich, March 6, 1888, it is clearly set out that such business may, at the will of the Senate, be considered with open doors.

That is the rule as it now stands, and that is the construction which Mr. Gilfry put upon it. That was the object of the change, namely, that the Senate could consider in secret executive or in open executive session any matters, in its own discretion.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, so far as the statements of the parliamentary expert who prepared these precedents are concerned, it is clear that they relate only to such communications as clearly may be considered in open executive session, and concerning which the seal of secrecy may be removed. Paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVI, cited by the Senator from Missouri, relates only to the clearing of the galleries. It requires that the galleries shall be cleared unless executive communications are to be considered in open executive session. We must look elsewhere, of course, to find what executive business may be considered in open executive session. That we find in the next paragraph, which reads:

All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Senators and the officers of the Senate kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon shall also be kept secret—

Now we come to the permission for an open executive session—until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy, or unless the same shall be considered in open executive session.

Mr. REED. Exactly; that is what I moved.

Mr. LENROOT. Therefore, it is really in order, in the consideration of a treaty, to consider the same in open executive session, and the seal of secrecy may be removed; but when we come to Rule XXXVIII, paragraph 2, there is no exception made, as there is in the case of a treaty, and the rule is inflexible that all votes and remarks of Senators when acting upon nominations concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated shall be kept secret.

Is it not entirely clear that if it had been the intention to permit open executive sessions in the consideration of nominations, the same exception would have been made that was made to paragraph 3 relating to treaties? The fact that it is not made as applying to nominations, and is made as applying to treaties, is conclusive, it seems to me, that the motion is not in order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat? He contends, then, that in the matter of treaties two-thirds of the Senators voting could bring about an open executive session?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I think a majority could.

Mr. HARRISON. The rule says two-thirds. But it is the Senator's contention that so far as nominations are concerned it must be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I wanted to get that clear, because that has been a question we have been fighting about before, and I have a resolution on the calendar that I shall press to cure that defect.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question. I want to get the Senator's opinion as to whether the consideration of nominations is executive business. Does the Senator think it is?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that—and I agree with the Senator; I think he is right—paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVI must apply to nominations?

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. NORRIS. That says executive business.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but that only applies to clearing the galleries. The galleries must be cleared unless the business is of such a nature as under the rules it may be considered in open executive session, and then provision is made for certain executive business which may be considered in open executive session. So the rule is entirely harmonious.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me read section 2 of Rule XXXVI:

> When acting upon confidential or executive business, unless the same shall be considered in open executive session, the Senate Chamber shall be cleared—

And so forth.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the next paragraph certain executive business may be considered in open executive session.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but the language "when acting upon confidential or executive business" would include nominations, would it not?

Mr. LENROOT. Not necessarily. This is only with reference to the clearing of the galleries. There are certain kinds of executive business which may be considered in open executive session; and if the business is of that character, of course, this rule shall not apply. That is all this rule has reference to.

Mr. NORRIS. What follows in paragraph 2 reduces the business to secret consideration, of course. It says that—> the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the principal legislative clerk, the executive clerk, the minute and Journal clerk, the Sergeant at Arms, the Assistant Doorkeeper, and such other officers as the Presiding Officer shall think necessary, and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy.

We have all those officers here always when we are in secret executive session.

Mr. LENROOT. That is only done to insure secrecy where the rules require it.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but I can not understand how the Senator can admit that the consideration of a nomination is executive business and then say that section 2 of Rule XXXVI does not apply to the consideration of nominations.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator a question there. If the Senator's construction is correct, what possible purpose could there have been in adding the last clause to paragraph 3 if it is already covered by paragraph 2, as the Senator contends—

> Or unless the same shall be considered in open executive session.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may inquire——

Mr. LENROOT. Before the Senator does that I would like to have an answer to my question from the Senator from Nebraska. If the Senator thinks that is all covered by paragraph 1, the paragraph which covers all executive business, that it may all be considered in open executive session, why is the last clause added to paragraph 3?

Mr. NORRIS. "Unless the same shall be considered in open executive session"?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I will read paragraph 3 of Rule XXXVI:

> All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Senators and the officers of the Senate kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy, or unless the same shall be considered in open executive session.

That applies to treaties.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes, but——

Mr. NORRIS. It applies to another form of executive business.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. The other rule applies to a different form of executive business, which is nominations.

Mr. LODGE. The first refers to nominations, of course.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. "All confidential communications." I would not take that to mean nominations. The making of a nomination is by our rules expressly stated not to be a secret.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator admit that the consideration of treaties is executive business?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator contends that paragraph 1 covers all executive business?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator say that treaties are to be considered in open executive session except for the last portion of paragraph 3?

Mr. NORRIS. At least, that would cover it. I am not saying there is nothing else in the rule which would permit it, and I concede to the Senator that that is sufficient authority to consider a treaty in open executive session.

Mr. LENROOT. There is no such authority in paragraph 2 relating to nominations, and there being none, the conclusion is irresistible that there can not be an open executive session without dispensing with the rules for the consideration of nominations.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's contention were right, then the makers of this rule would never have printed the clause "unless the same shall be considered in open executive session," because that as to treaties is repeated. I admit with the Senator that what is in paragraph 3 of the rule does not apply to nominations. It applies exclusively to treaties and other confidential communications.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think that if there be any other executive business than treaties or nominations, it may be considered in open executive session if the Senate sees fit to do so, and that where the rule provides that proceedings must be kept secret, without at the same time providing that the injunction of secrecy may be removed and the matter considered in open executive session, it can not be done?

Mr. NORRIS. The point that seems to me clear is that all executive business of all kinds, whether it is nominations or confidential communications—everything that can come under the definition of executive business—can be considered in open executive session. That must follow, or the language is absolutely meaningless. That is the way it seems to me.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am unable to follow the reasoning of the Senator from Wisconsin. I think it very easy to follow the language through and understand it. The first paragraph of Rule XXXVI provides that—

> When the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber for the consideration of executive business, he shall have a seat on the right of the Presiding Officer. When the Senate shall be convened by the President of the United States to any other place, the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Senators shall attend the place appointed, with the necessary officers of the Senate.

That contemplates that when the President has any executive business whatsoever, he may come to the Senate in person, as was once the custom. He may, of course, proceed by written message, which is now the custom. Paragraph 2 reads:

> When acting upon confidential or executive business——

Now, executive business embraces everything the Executive may submit to Congress. There may be, in addition to executive business, business of a confidential character which the Senate itself desires to consider in secret, but when acting upon a confidential matter or anything the Executive may submit—

> Unless the same shall be considered in open executive session, the Senate Chamber shall be cleared.

The language there clearly implies that there may be an open executive session on any executive matter or upon any confidential matter whatsoever, but it will require action by the Senate to proceed in open executive session.

Paragraph 3 reads:

All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Senators and the officers of the Senate kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon shall also be kept secret * * * unless the same shall be considered in open executive session.

So treaties may be considered in open executive session. The language of the rule so implies. If the language there implies that treaties may be considered in open executive session, then the language of paragraph 2 applying to all executive business being the same, namely, "unless the same shall be considered in open executive session," applies to all executive business.

Now I come to the rule to which the Vice President calls attention, Rule XXXVII, which provides, when treaties shall be laid before the Senate, how the Senate shall proceed, that the treaty may be printed in confidence for the use of the Senate, and that in any stage of the proceedings the Senate may remove the injunction of secrecy from the treaty. That is merely carrying into effect the provision which regulates entirely the proceedings with reference to treaties, the same provision which had already been in the rule.

When we come to nominations in Rule XXXVIII we find—

When nominations shall be made by the President of the United States to the Senate they shall, unless otherwise ordered, be referred to appropriate committees.

But we all know that the words "unless otherwise ordered" have been construed to give the Senate the full right to pass upon the appointments without any reference to a committee. We ordinarily do refer nominations to committees, but we have the power to not refer them to committees. Indeed, I think that was done in the case of former Senator Kenyon a few days ago.

Then follow the provisions with reference to the discussion of nominations. They are to be in secret "unless otherwise ordered," and that runs through the entire proposition.

Mr. President, the Senate, I think, will hardly be willing to say that it can not consider a nomination in open executive session. Nomination after nomination has been considered in this body in open executive session. It happens time and again. The nomination of former Senator Kenyon was considered the other day in open executive session and the galleries were not cleared.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator know of any nomination considered in open session except by unanimous consent?

Mr. REED. The question of unanimous consent does not come in here. There is an absolute rule, and we can not waive the rule by unanimous consent where the rule is absolute. Where the rule says the body can only proceed in secret, we can not by unanimous consent proceed otherwise.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator assert that?

Mr. REED. I assert it.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator know that by unanimous consent the rules of the Senate can be disregarded and the Senate can do anything it sees fit?

Mr. REED. I assert that just as I assert any question which goes to the question of jurisdiction. The Senate can waive many matters by unanimous consent. The Senate could not waive the Constitution of the United States by unanimous consent, nor could it waive a constitutional provision. We have considered appointment after appointment in open executive session.

I will undertake to find plenty of such precedents if given a little time. The language of Rule XXXVI is, "unless the same shall be considered in open executive session," implying that there is such a thing as an open executive session.

I do not care to argue the question further, and I care very little about this particular case. I would not have made the motion except that a statement was made here that Maj. Peck was being put in a bad light by having his report discussed in the open session—an Army report, which was all I did discuss—and the evidence being kept from the public. Thereupon I moved to consider the nomination in open executive session, so that Maj. Peck could have the benefit of the evidence and of the discussion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. KING. What is the status of the motion that is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair ruled some time ago that, in his opinion, the point of order was well taken, and that the motion was not in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that Rule XL itself provides:

Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule XII.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I simply state at this time that I shall take the trouble to look into the precedents in this matter, and if I can convince the Chair, in order that our precedents may be kept straight, I shall ask the Chair to reconsider the matter at a later time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be very glad to do that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may ask the indulgence of the Senate for one moment further, in my remarks I may have been understood to criticize the President for sending in this nomination. What the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has stated is true. The nomination had to be sent in under the law, and, therefore, anything I may have said that appeared to reflect on the President I should withdraw; but, at the same time, I desire further to remark that I protest against any law that proposes to promote men automatically. I think this is an illustration of the vice of such a law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in glancing at Gilfry's Precedents I have found one which seems to me to bear very directly on the point which has recently been under discussion. A resolution was offered by Mr. Riddleberger on July 8, 1886:

That the doors of the Senate shall not be closed during the time that the executive nominations are pending, discussed, or voted upon.

On July 9, 1886, the President pro tempore (John Sherman) laid before the Senate the resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. Riddleberger, providing that the doors shall not be closed during the discussions of executive nominations; when Mr. Harris—

That was Senator Harris, of Tennessee, who was a very able parliamentarian—raised a question of order that the resolution proposed an amendment to the Standing Rules of the Senate, and that the provisions of Rule XL, prescribing the mode of amendment to the rules, were not complied with.

The President pro tempore sustained the point of order.

That was general instead of particular, but it covers, I think, the point which has been raised.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, which is Senate resolution 213.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate, so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I had understood on yesterday that we were going to have an executive session to consider the case which has been under discussion this afternoon. May I ask the Senator when it is his intention to move an executive session?

Mr. LODGE. I made no statement about it. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] gave notice that when the Senate next went into executive session he would bring up the Peck nomination.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood on yesterday that some Senator stated that to-day an effort would be made to have an executive session earlier than usual.

Mr. LODGE. No; nothing of that sort was said, so far as I know; but the Senator from New York, as I have stated, gave notice that at the next executive session he would call up the nomination to which reference has been made. That is the only notice, so far as I know, that has been given.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that there has been considerable discussion on that proposition. May I ask when it is the intention to go into executive session to consider that nomination?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, is the Senator addressing his inquiry to me?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to go into closed executive session immediately.

Mr. HARRISON. That is satisfactory.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] are in charge of the matter which is the unfinished business before the Senate, and naturally I defer to their judgment as to the procedure.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I shall not request the yeas and nays on that motion at present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRISON. I withhold the motion for just a moment, if some Senator on the other side desires to make the motion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that, perhaps, it is possible to dispose of pending motion relating to the resolution to amend the rules? My disposition would be to delay, if possible, going into executive session until a vote may be taken upon that motion. Then I would ask, if it be not too late, that we go into executive session for the remainder of the afternoon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think I can state to the Senator from New York that there will be considerable discussion of the proposed amendment of the rules, a discussion which could not be completed within several hours.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 2 hours and 10 minutes spent in secret executive session, the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) took a recess in secret session until tomorrow, March 4, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 3, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. WALSH as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, we bless Thee that Thou hast taken pleasure in sparing our lives and condescending to our needs. This day give us great thoughts, great hopes, and sure visions. Brighten our joys and let the light of the upper world fall upon us. Teach us that sometimes standing still is progress, waiting means victory, and failure often contributes to success. Inspire our wills with the spirit of obedience and service and all our days may we know that we are not forgotten. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] was delivering his remarks yesterday and when he was stating that Gov. Reily hoisted the American flag over the schools of Porto Rico over the protests of the people who I said he removed from office, I arose and said: "I deny that most emphatically. The gentleman is entirely incorrect." I have the stenographic notes, which are correct, and have seen that my denial was suppressed from the RECORD.

The following words appeared also suppressed:

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? That is a personal attack upon me, and I must ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may do that later when we are in the House.

I also ask permission to make the following correction: On page 3302 instead of "They were Americans" insert "They are two continental Americans appointed as heads of departments."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Commissioner from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA] asks unanimous consent to correct the RECORD by inserting certain remarks which he says were made by him during the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER]. The Chair understands the rule to be that if a Member having the floor yields to another Member, that the Member having the floor in revising and extending his remarks can not strike out the remarks of the person to whom he yielded. But if the Member having the floor has not yielded to another Member, the interpolations of a Member may be stricken out of the remarks by the person having the floor. The Chair understands that the Commissioner from Porto Rico asked the gentleman from Kansas to yield and the gentleman from Kansas yielded, and in revising his remarks the gentleman from Kansas omitted to include the remarks of the Commissioner of Porto Rico. Is that the fact?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is not the fact, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Kansas did not yield to the gentleman from Porto Rico, but that the gentleman from Porto Rico injected his remarks into the remarks of my colleague. My colleague is not here and I object to any such correction until he has been consulted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas objects.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. There is another correction which the gentleman from Porto Rico asks to have made in his own remarks. I suppose there is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Porto Rico asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by making certain corrections in his own remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If it is contained in the same matter, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas objects.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Porto Rico only wanted to extend his remarks to make corrections.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I think it is only fair that the gentleman from Porto Rico should consult with the gentleman from Kansas, and I therefore object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2492) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1921.

The message also announced that the Senate had concurred in the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 49.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 5013) entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the use of certain titles on tablets and other memorials," the Clerk be authorized and directed to enroll the title so as to read as follows:

"An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the inscription of titles upon certain monuments, tablets, or other memorials."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the farm risk insurance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on farm risk insurance. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD] and broadcasted by radio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech by his colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD], broadcasted by radio. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to include an address delivered by J. B. Powell, secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of China, which he delivered before the Board of Trade at Washington on American trade with China.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by J. B. Powell before the Board of Trade at Washington on American trade with China. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Mr. WALSH, of Massachusetts, is not on the floor and the fact that he makes it a uniform rule to object to the printing of such matter, I am going to object until he can be again on the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects.

SECOND DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10663, the deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SANDERS of Indiana in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

The three foregoing appropriations shall be disbursed by the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 2, after line 10, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For payment to Henry T. Rainey for expenses incurred as contestant in the contested-election case of Rainey v. Shaw, audited and recommended by the Committee on Elections No. 2, $1,999.38."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this item was certified by the Committee on Elections after the bill was reported. Hence the necessity for the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does this include counsel fees?

Mr. MADDEN. These are the expenses certified by the committee. They are within 62 cents of the statutory limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery for Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, fiscal year 1921, $250.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 2, line 24, strike out "fiscal year 1921" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "for the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the reason for offering this amendment is that the expenses referred to begin to accrue after July, 1922, and carry over into another year, and we have to change the language to make it conform to the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to such persons as were actually engaged in the work designated by him, and in such proportion as he may deem just for the assistance rendered during the Sixty-seventh Congress in compiling the list of reports to be made to Congress by public officials, compiling copy, and revising proof for the House portion of the Official Register; preparing and indexing the statistical reports of the Clerk of the House; compiling the telephone and Members' directories; preparing and indexing the daily calendars of business; preparing the official statement of Members' voting records; and for recording and filing statements of political committees and candidates for nomination and election to the House of Representatives, pursuant to the campaign contribution laws, $5,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to ask a question with regard to the directories. The gentleman from Illinois will probably remember that when the first edition of the Congressional Directory was gotten out in this Congress it was discovered that the little mark which indicates whether a Member is a Democrat or a Republican was changed or omitted with respect to one Member from Connecticut. Because of that one little error all of those directories which had been printed and which had been distributed were recalled and the directory was corrected. The gentleman from Illinois is pledged to economy. Does he think that it is carrying out economy to recall a whole directory simply because of one little error like that?

Mr. MADDEN. The directory was not recalled, as I understand it. They just cut the page out. That is a matter for the Committee on Public Printing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the directories distributed in the Capitol, which could be easily reached, were called in, opened, and a new page inserted. The cost of that was not much, a little more than the cost would have been to paste a slip on. This was not done at the request of the Members, it was done in the interest of having the directory accurate.

Mr. BLANTON. I am just calling attention to the insignificance of this mistake, because everyone knows the gentleman from Connecticut is a stanch, orthodox, lifelong Republican.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The point lies here: Directories, encyclopedias, and other books of reference should not have mistakes in them. The committee were of opinion that that was a mistake which they were entitled to correct and which should be corrected, and it was corrected at a small cost.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that the word "committee" in line 23, page 3, is misspelled. Without objection, the spelling will be corrected.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL.

House Office Building: For maintenance, including miscellaneous items, and for all necessary services, $49,800.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is this $49,800 in addition to the regular appropriation and the estimates made when the regular appropriation bill was before the House?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. The House Office Building is controlled by the House Office Building Commission, who ordered the Architect of the Capitol to paint the office rooms there, put in new mail chutes, and make other repairs, all of which have been done. This is the amount that they cost. I think they put in some new lighting fixtures.

Mr. DOWELL. May I inquire of the chairman, as this matter has been before us frequently, if the officers are entirely ignoring the appropriation in making these expenditures without reference to the appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. They authorized the work to be done, and it was done, and of course there is nothing left for us to do except to make the appropriation to pay the bills.

Mr. DOWELL. Has this commission authority to expend an unlimited amount of money and compel the payment by appropriation in a deficiency bill?

Mr. MADDEN. They have authority to make any improvements or repairs that may be necessary in the building under their jurisdiction. What they did, as I understand it, was to order the rooms painted. I understand that most of them have been painted. They ordered new mail chutes because they found that the mail chutes that were there held the mail and it got stuck and did not get to its destination. I think also that they ordered some new lighting fixtures. All of those are included in the item appropriated.

Mr. DOWELL. Did the committee allow this simply because it was a necessary improvement or because the commission had proceeded to expend the money?

Mr. MADDEN. They first ordered this appropriation because the bills had been contracted, and the work had been done. We assumed, I will say, that the commission having charge of the building and having authority would not have ordered the work unless they thought it was an essential improvement.

Mr. DOWELL. But the committee had not further data and no further responsibility than to allow the claims as presented, without reference to the nature of the improvement?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course we could not go into that because it was all done. We did not know whether it was needed or not.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to get the policy of this committee, and I am trying to inquire, not with reference to this item alone. This item may be perfectly all right, but I think we ought to stop somewhere these commissions and officials contracting indebtedness where there is no appropriation for the expenditure.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, as far as we are able to do that we are doing it.

Mr. MANN. May I ask my colleague—I do not see any member of the House Office Commission on the floor—the items covered by this item in the bill were for various expenses incurred in the House Office Building where contracts were let and money expended under authority of the House Office Commission, but no money appropriated to pay it?

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is the fact.

Mr. MANN. I know that is the fact; that is stated in the estimate; there is no controversy about it; but I just wondered when I read that item whether it was the policy of the House Office Commission to authorize the Architect of the Capitol, and the ex officio Superintendent of the House Office Building, to let contracts for various improvements, and carry out contracts where no money has been appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, it seems to have been the policy in this case.

Mr. MANN. I served on the House Office Commission for a great many years, and I feel quite confident, without attempting in any way to reflect upon the action of the present commission, while I was a member of the House Office Commission we did not undertake to do that thing. We undertook to get the appropriation before we spent the money.

Mr. DOWELL. Can the gentleman explain to the House how we can curtail expenses if all these commissions, boards, and officials are proceeding to make contracts and bring them to the Committee on Appropriations for appropriation?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think it would have curtailed the expenses any, because the improvements which were made in the House Office Building were all necessary improvements. All the money was not expended. Part is for reconstructing the mail chutes over there, which I am told did not work very well, and part of it is for painting roofs and other improvements, part of which has been done and part has not been done.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

RECORDER OF DEEDS.

The recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia is authorized to purchase book typewriter machines or parts thereof to an amount not exceeding $6,549: Provided, That not to exceed $5,872.20 of the purchase price shall be paid from the fees and emoluments of his office, and that he shall exchange, as the balance of the purchase price, old book typewriter machines of the value of not less than $676.80.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he could tell us about how many women there are employed in this department?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think I can tell the gentleman how many women there are, but the recorder, who came before the committee, said that he needed five more record writers to operate these typewriting machines; that the work of the office was six months in arrears and the typewriters he had now are worn out.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not the particular point I want to get at. Is it not a fact that there are some less than 100 white women in this department?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know how many there are. This is all a fee office, and we do not go into that very much.

Mr. BLANTON. The point I did want to go into was this: I do not know how the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations feels about it, but I do know that the American people do not believe in having a whole department of good white women working under the direct supervision of a colored chief over them. That is the condition in this department, because I understand the recorder of deeds, a colored man, has been appointed and confirmed, and these white women, some of them I guess may come from Illinois, they either have to work there and take their orders from him as chief or they have to get up and leave their jobs and quit the Government service. Now, that is not a political question. It is a bigger thing than a question of politics. It is a question of what is right and wrong with regard to these white women employees of the Government. Go to them and the chairman will find out they do not like it. Go to them and he will find out that their relatives do not like it. Ask the people generally over the country or in Illinois or in Massachusetts and you will find out that the white people of this country do not like it. A political exigency does not make it right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEWERS.

For operation and maintenance of the sewage pumping service, including repairs to boilers, machinery, and pumping stations, and employment of mechanics, laborers, and two watchmen, purchase of coal, oils, waste, and other supplies, and for maintenance of motor trucks, $18,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I inquire of the chairman if these items were not provided for in the regular appropriation bill?

Mr. MADDEN. No. The $18,000 is to maintain the pumping stations which pump the sewage for the District for the balance of the year. It was shown beyond any question of doubt that unless they get this money to buy additional fuel, coal, oil, and other things like that, and keep the men at work, that a bad sanitary condition might result.

Mr. DOWELL. Was not that estimated for at all?

Mr. MADDEN. It was estimated for.

Mr. DOWELL. But was not sufficient?

Mr. MADDEN. Was not sufficient.

Mr. DOWELL. I notice there are a number of employees added?

Mr. MADDEN. No; no employees are added; not any.

Mr. DOWELL. It says employment of mechanics.

Mr. MADDEN. Those are the mechanics who are there.

Mr. DOWELL. And two watchmen.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the language of the law.

Mr. DOWELL. Are not these provided for in the regular appropriation bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; in the regular appropriation bill, but if they do not get this money they can not keep the engineers at work. They have not enough coal, oil, and so forth, to keep the system going.

Mr. DOWELL. I understand from the gentleman's explanation that coal and oil is needed, and that in the regular appropriation you have the employees designated, and you make provision in the regular appropriation bill——

Mr. MANN. But if the gentleman will yield, I simply want to suggest that in making a deficiency appropriation it is customary to use the same language as in the original appropriation, so you would not have to keep two sets of book accounts.

Mr. DOWELL. As to all these men so far as it relates to employees it is a mere copy of the language of the original appropriation?

Mr. MANN. That is all.

Mr. MADDEN. That was all.

Mr. DOWELL. And the item really is for the purchase of coal and oil?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. And the next item, I wish to say to my good friends, is for permit work for sewers, to connect new buildings that are going up, and all this work is reimbursable, so it does not cost the Government anything. It is all paid back by the owners of the property.

The Clerk read as follows:

STREETS.

Dust prevention, cleaning, and snow removal: For dust prevention, sweeping, and cleaning streets, avenues, alleys, and suburban streets, under the immediate direction of the commissioners, and for cleaning snow and ice from streets, sidewalks, crosswalks, and gutters, including the same objects specified under this head in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, $30,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, just one other item. I notice an item of $30,000 here which might be used for the cleaning of snow from the streets.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Has the gentleman detected anybody in the city of Washington making an attempt to clear the streets of snow?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say that I was not very well satisfied with the job they did, but they had, when the great snowstorm came, an unexpended balance of about $173,000 in the street and snow cleaning fund, which would have enabled them to go without any deficiency if the snow had not come, and they showed us they had expended $30,000 out of that; that is, to clean snow. And without having it restored——

Mr. DOWELL. Did they show the gentleman from the books or from the streets?

Mr. MADDEN. We are not very well satisfied about the condition of the streets; but they say they did a good job, and, of course, we did not make the examination, because the snow had gone by the time they came to us.

Mr. DOWELL. That is, the sun cleared the streets?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; cleared some of them.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman think we should withhold this $30,000 until at least some effort is made by the departments to do a little work?

Mr. MADDEN. I am afraid we ought not, because they undoubtedly spent it. Whether they did a good job or not, I do not know. If this $30,000 is not added to the fund which they had before that they might not have anything to clean the streets with near the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand it, there was an ample amount appropriated for the cleaning of the streets of snow, and so forth. They have used only $30,000 for this purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. They used the $30,000 for snow.

Mr. DOWELL. At least, some part of that was included in the regular appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. And why should they come here and ask for reimbursement of every cent they spent for cleaning the snow when that was the purpose of the original appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, nobody dreamed that any such snowstorm as that had——

Mr. DOWELL. Conceding it was extreme, why should they ask for the actual amount they expended, some part of the original appropriation being intended for the purpose of cleaning the snow?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to my friend that if everybody was as hard on the applicants for deficiencies as our committee has been, he would discover that we do not let anything get by unless they prove their case.

Mr. DOWELL. I concede the gentleman is very careful. But I fear he is reimbursing the entire sum, when at least a part of it that had already been appropriated has been used for this purpose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in view of what has been said on the floor, and in view of some of the comments which have been made concerning the clearing of snow from the streets after the recent snowstorm, I want to say that in my opinion the District Commissioners did exceedingly good work in cleaning off the snow in the District of Columbia. Perhaps out in Iowa, in one of these country towns, they carry all the snow from the streets and dump it onto somebody's farm, though I somewhat doubt it. Now, as to the appropriation here, snow cleaning is included by language every year in the street-cleaning item, though it is not expected that it will be used ordinarily, and it is not used, because there had not been an especially large snowstorm in Washington to use up that appropriation of late years, but unless it were included in the item the District Commissioners could not commence to clean snow at all until Congress had acted specially.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman, then, means to have us understand when we put this item in we did not mean it; that it had no reference to the snow?

Mr. MANN. My friend from Iowa may believe that. I do not think anybody else in the House believes it. I say—and I repeat it for the benefit of my distinguished friend from Iowa—that in order to permit snow cleaning to be had without special action of Congress the language authorizing snow cleaning is included in that street-cleaning item, and there is no sum added to the amount originally appropriated for snow cleaning.

Mr. DOWELL. My experience has been, however, that Congress has plenty of time to act before the departments act in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has had long experience in Congress and knows that sometimes we have made a special appropriation for snow cleaning. My experience is that the last time the District Commissioners went to work at snow cleaning just as soon as the snow had fallen. They did not cart it all away. They did not open up all the sidewalks and all the street crossings at once, because my friend from Iowa would not go down and work and help them do it. They were short of labor. And we preferred to loaf around in our easy, warm quarters rather than to go and shovel snow.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

For repairs and improvements of fire boat, fiscal year 1921, $20.91.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, to-day marks the close of the career of Mr. Will Hays as a member of the Cabinet. To millions of Republicans it is a day of thanksgiving and rejoicing. As an old-line Republican, representing a rock-ribbed Republican district in Illinois, I join in this feeling, a feeling that is well-nigh universal among Republicans, a feeling that I know is overwhelming in my district. Mr. Hays has been the one disappointment of the first year of Republican administration. He entered the Cabinet with the confidence, the love, and affection of that great army of Republican workers throughout the country who made possible the tremendous Republican victory in 1920. They believed and felt he was one of them. He had in millions of letters bearing his signature, in public speeches, and in private conversation led them to believe that. He had preached organization, and had always impressed the vital importance of a change of administration and the removal of Democratic officials from their places. Entering the Cabinet one of its most popular members, he is quitting to-day by unanimous consent. [Laughter.] This is because in the minds of Republicans he is to-day the prince of mugwumps. They may be wrong. Mr. Hays may be the greatest Postmaster General the country has seen. He may be the great "humanizer" uplift publications picture him to be. But the cold fact remains that the great army of loyal Republicans who carried the last election do not view him in that light. To them the most popular act of his life is his retirement from the Cabinet. [Laughter.] They feel under everlasting obligations to the movies for the great service they have rendered the Republican Party. [Laughter.]

If there are those high in the councils of the Republican Party or of this administration who do not know and appreciate the universal dissatisfaction among Republicans over the management of the Post Office Department, they had better wake up to that situation. This disappointment is not confined to applicants seeking postal appointments by any means. If that was the extent of the resentment and ill feeling, it would not be a very serious matter. It takes in whole communities and is general in every county and every State of the Union.

The people know this: That when the Democratic Party came into power in 1913 every Republican postmaster and official was kicked out and a good Democrat put in his place. The people approved that. No Republican complains about it, because it was the natural and proper thing to do. Republicans remember the great housecleaning in 1913, and they do not understand, they can not understand, why it is almost impossible to get a Democrat out of an office he holds simply because he is a Democrat. It may be Mr. Hays is not responsible for this situation, but in the mind of Republicans he is looked upon as the guilty person, and for that reason his retirement is universally popular and satisfactory.

THE BURIAL OF SIR WILL HAYS.

Not a sob is heard, nor a mournful note,
As Sir Will to the movies is hurried;
Not a Republican breathes a farewell sigh,
Over the grave where their Jonah is buried.

[Laughter.]

We part with him gladly, so young and bright,
His going leaves not an ache nor a yearning;
In the rays of the movies' calcium light
He is welcome to all he is earning.

[Laughter.]

No heroic medal adorns his breast,
Nor in love's affections we wind him;
But he lies like a mugwump taking his rest,
With his high-brow cloak around him.

[Laughter.]

Few and short are the praises said,
And we speak not a word of sorrow;
But we joyfully gaze on the face of our dead,
And we cheerfully think of the morrow.

[Laughter.]

We think as we gaze on his gorgeous bed,
And watch movie stars arrange his soft pillow;
Our Democratic friends will no longer be fed
While Republicans, blue, weep under the willow.

[Laughter.]

Sadly the Demies will mourn him that's gone,
And o'er fond recollections upbraid us;
But little we'll reck if they'll cease to hold on,
To places the people at the election gave us.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. No motion was made.

Mr. BLANTON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, ingratitude is the dominant characteristic of the great Republican Party.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McARTHUR. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. I am discussing the last speech. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, the subject of attack in the last speech, Hon. Will H. Hays, managed the campaign that made it possible for this other side of the House to have 170 majority in the House of Representatives. It made it possible for a Republican to occupy the White House. It made it possible for a landslide to come to the gentleman's party. Will H. Hays was in charge of the political fortunes of all Republican politicians last campaign, and when he performed his duty so well that he brought into this House 170 new Republican Members——

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret I can not yield.

When he did all this, now that he is retiring, the hammer is used on him.

Ingratitude, I say, ingratitude is a great attribute of your party, a party that promised this and that to the voters of this country for their votes, and a party that should be grateful to Will H. Hays for the great landslide, yet after the votes were secured, after the seats are now being held by the recipients of those votes, ingratitude steps in; they are forgetting what has been done for them, and they seek to strike the very one who did most to help make that success possible. What can you expect in the elections of the future?

I have no brief for Will H. Hays, but when any Republican voluntarily quits public office, I am for him. He has removed more good Democrats from post offices in my district than I can count. He has done that much for the Republican Party. He displeases, however, because he would not blindly obey orders. But he is quitting now, and when a man is quitting public life, even though he is a Republican, I would rather give him a bunch of flowers than stab him when he can not answer. I do not believe in stabbing men when they have no opportunity to reply. Will H. Hays is this moment a Cabinet officer, but he ceases to be so to-day. He can not come upon this floor and defend himself. He has to stand the stab that a member of his own party gives him when he is retiring from public office. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, Will H. Hays, after all, is no insignificant individual. We from Indiana know something of his public career. It has always been difficult for an incoming administration, without doing violence to the very fundamental principles of all government, to change too rapidly the personnel.

In a way the attack on Mr. Hays does him honor, for it reveals that he was unwilling, through ultra partisanship, to recognize accusations made against men simply and only because they were Democrats and thus have them removed from office before their time expired.

Really Mr. Hays needs no defense. I doubt if any man could have taken the position he occupied without having been subjected to some degree of criticism if he had tried to do his honest duty obligated by the oath he had taken. In the beginning of Mr. Wilson's administration the Democrats of my own district walked up and down the streets damning the administration because it had not moved more rapidly in the removal of Republicans from office, and so in this instance such an accusation against Mr. Hays does him honor instead of doing him dishonor.

I hold no brief for him. He needs none. It was no mean thing for a man to come into the chairmanship in the State of Indiana when the party was split asunder; it was no mean thing for a man to be so fair, so honest, so clean in his methods that before the campaign was over both sides recognized that standpat and progressives had been forgotten. The Republican Party, cemented together by the wisdom and the honesty and the ability of Will H. Hays, moved forward and won and won, until Indiana presented a solid delegation in the House of Representatives and in the Senate. [Applause on the Republican side.] And then, chosen as national chairman, he was one of those most efficient in healing the breaches in the Republican Party throughout the length and breadth of the Nation, because both sides had confidence that they were working under a chairman who, above all else, loved the country and believed from the bottom of his heart that its vast interests would be safeguarded in the hands of the Republican Party. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON ASYLUM AND JAIL.

Hospital: For provisions, fuel, forage, harness and vehicles and repair to same, gas, ice, shoes, clothing, dry goods, tailoring, drugs and medical supplies, furniture and bedding, kitchen utensils, and other necessary items, including an allowance to the superintendent of not exceeding $360 per annum for maintenance of vehicles for use in discharge of his official duties, for the fiscal years that follow:

Fiscal year 1920, $1,307.35;
Fiscal year 1921, $1,244.61.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I enjoyed the speech of my colleague from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD]. It was ably put, and as a Member on this side I neither desire to defend nor to criticize. Repeatedly I have stated my position on this floor, and that is "To the victors belong the spoils." But what I object to is the present system or method of appointing postmasters, and what I am wondering about is whether the future administration of the Post Office Department will change that system or not, to wit, the so-called civil service proclamation method of appointing postmasters. In other words, at present it is simply used as a screen, and civil service means nothing.

My colleague from Indiana said the objection in his State was because Will Hays had not been active enough. Perhaps, as was stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and as was also the case in my district, he was too busy looking southward to have time enough to attend to any of the applications of Republicans up in Indiana. I want either the civil service or the spoils system, if they are going to name them that way. But I am tired of the shell game, under the operation of which one is not able to tell what you can do, and when you can do it, and who is going to be appointed, except at some time, somehow, a Republican will be appointed.

I know of one case in my district where a Democratic postmaster was removed because he was active in politics, on a charge made by an anonymous writer, and the Post Office Department refused to give the name of the man making the charge.

Against such methods I object and I believe and so wrote to the department, saying that it was unfair and unkind and not just to remove a man on charges made by any person who was not willing to sign his name to the charges, so that the accused might meet his accuser.

To show you the present efficiency of the Post Office Department, of which my Republican colleagues on the right have boasted so much—and it is very efficient—I have been trying for about nine months to get some action in several cases in my district where acting postmasters were appointed. The acting postmasters happen to be Republicans and the other applicants are Republicans, but, although it has been from 9 to 12 months, the Post Office Department will not decide among those Republicans which one is the most capable of filling the position.

On the 8th of February I wrote a letter to my son in my home town. The letter was addressed to Joseph Sears, Kissimmee, Fla. On the 11th of February that letter was returned to Washington. In the left-hand corner, following the instruction of the Post Office Department, I wrote "From W. J. SEARS, M. C., Washington, D. C."

On the 1st day of March I received that letter in my office here. Of course, Mr. Chairman, having lived 40 years in my home town, and my son having been born in the town and having lived there 18 years, it was impossible in a city of only a few thousand, and where there is city delivery, like that in which my friend from Iowa lives, perhaps, to know who he was. I am not objecting to that, because I get many letters addressed to Joe Sears, and the postal employees forward them promptly to me, believing they are for me, and in this instance evidently overlooked the statement in the left-hand corner showing by whom the letter had been written. But I have been unable to understand why this efficient Post Office Department should hold the letter in Washington from the 13th of February until the 1st of March, while Will Hays was down in Florida, the best State in the Union, enjoying our beautiful winter climate and our health-giving atmosphere. I simply cite that as an illustration that it is very easy to criticize and to condemn. Now that a new Postmaster General is coming in, I trust that a Member of Congress, even if he is not known at home, may be known to some of the employees in Washington who are in the Postal Service and that important letters may be returned to him promptly if they can not be delivered to the person to whom they are addressed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WILLIAMS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was conmunicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

WATER DEPARTMENT.

For extension of the water department distribution system, laying of such service mains as may be necessary under the assessment system, to be paid wholly from the revenues of the water department, $50,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There has been considerable discussion lately with reference to the water system of the city of Washington. I think the average man desires to do what is right in connection with it and desires to have all the information available regarding this very important adjunct of our public service. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what are the receipts from the water department? Are there any excess funds in that department, or is it all used in the upkeep? As a usual thing in any community the water department is the one paying public utility.

Mr. MADDEN. I am sorry to say that I have not the figures as to the water revenues here, but I am sure that the water department of Washington is more than self-sustaining.

Mr. SNELL. Has the gentleman the idea that the water rates should be increased and still not be out of proportion to what people are paying in other cities, so as to take care of any necessary improvements in order to provide for the future?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no trouble about water-main extensions being paid out of the revenues. I doubt if it would be possible to make the revenues meet such a capital expenditure as will be required for the new water system which has been proposed.

Mr. SNELL. I have understood from some statements made here on the floor of the House that the average householder in Washington pays only about one-half as much for his water as the average householder in other communities of similar size.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is not true, judging from my own experience here and in Chicago.

Mr. SNELL. That would be a fair standard to judge by.

Mr. MADDEN. We pay a much smaller rate for water in Chicago than people pay here.

Mr. MANN. Much less.

Mr. MADDEN. The rate in Chicago is not more than two-thirds of the Washington rate, and I doubt if it is that much.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe the rate in Chicago is more than a third or a fourth of what it is here.

Mr. SNELL. In the small town in which I live I pay twice as much.

Mr. MADDEN. We have revenue enough to maintain the service in Chicago and also to build the tunnels and extensions; but I may say to the gentleman from New York that it costs a little more money to run the water department here than it does in Chicago in proportion to the volume of business done, because no filtration is necessary there, and here it is necessary to filter the water.

Mr. SNELL. What I had in mind was to find out if I could whether it was possible under proper organization, with proper rates, for this city to go forward and construct and maintain an adequate water supply for its present and future needs.

Mr. MADDEN. It is, without any additional charge being made for the water. I do not mean to say that they could build a great addition to the plant, costing millions of dollars, out of the revenues of the water department.

Mr. SNELL. That is, like the conduit from the Great Falls?

Mr. MADDEN. No; but they can cover everything else and still have a little revenue left. This $50,000 is an item for the extension of mains to the territory where there is a lot of new building going on, and the people who own the houses there will pay this back.

Mr. SNELL. Was any information brought before the gentleman's committee relative to the general subject of the improvements of the water system which have been so much discussed in the papers?

Mr. MADDEN. That did not come before this subcommittee, but we had it before one of our subcommittees, and we went into it very exhaustively. I think it may be fairly said that for safety in the future there ought to be some beginning on the work of water-plant extension.

Mr. SNELL. For the general supply of the city?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; so that when the population increases you will have the supply ready to meet the increased population.

Mr. SNELL. As that is a subject which will come before the House very soon I thought that if the gentleman had the information before his committee it would not be a bad idea to have it brought out at the present time.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say that I think there ought to be something done.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU.

Vocational rehabilitation: For an additional amount for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, funeral and other incidental expenses (including transportation of remains) of deceased trainees of the board, necessary medical service and treatment to trainees hereafter required in cases where such service or treatment is not provided by the war risk insurance act as amended; printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office; law books, books of reference, and periodicals, $73,714,182: Provided, That the salary limitations placed upon the appropriation for vocational rehabilitation by the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 19, 1919, modified as provided by the sundry civil appropriation act approved June 5, 1920, shall apply to the appropriation herein made.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, after the word "made," in line 11, insert the following: "Provided further, That no part of the foregoing appropriation shall be expended for construction work except making necessary repairs at any Army camp acquired by the United States Veterans' Bureau for use as a training center."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is the same limitation that was carried in the last bill. We forgot to include it, and I hope it will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a motion to strike out the last word, or whatever is necessary. I am not a chronic critic and I do not propose to become one of this bureau now because they have an enormous duty to perform, both to the people and the ex-soldiers. But I want to call attention to the fact that their medical bureaus hold so many examinations and vary so much in their conclusions that in some places the service is being criticized and discredited.

In my district, in my county, there are only a few claims coming from the county, although there were many soldiers at the front, but a young man was awarded total permanent disability. He carried a $10,000 life insurance, and that made his life insurance available and relieved him of paying the premiums and also gave him $90 a month compensation in addition to his insurance. He also had a policy in the New York Life Insurance Co.—and this is where the criticism comes in—that the Government is harder on its people than the soulless corporation. As I say, he had a policy in the New York Life Insurance Co. which provided that the premium should be waived if he was totally disabled, and the installments were provided for just as the Government life insurance does. Probably many of you are familiar with those policies.

Now, what happened? He went along for two years on his total permanent disability with both concerns. Last December the New York Life Insurance Co.'s medical authorities examined him and continued him as totally disabled permanently, waiving the premiums and paying the installments, but the medical officers at Atlanta examined him, and they reduced him to total temporary disability. Mind you, he had been three years not able to do anything and two years on the totally disabled list, and yet the New York Life Insurance Co., a corporation merely in it for the money they can make out of it, held his condition to be totally disabled and continued to waive its premium, while the Veterans' Bureau, by a ruling made by the medical director, has notified him that he is no longer permanently disabled but only temporarily disabled. There has been no change in his condition, and yet his insurance installment will stop and he must begin paying the premium this month.

Of course, when I appealed to the bureau here, they have required another examination, and I believe they will correct it. But that kind of a thing of the Veterans' Bureau dealing more harshly with these soldiers than the soulless corporation is not creditable to the medical department in the veterans' examination, of which they have one about every three months. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

White-pine blister rust control: For meeting the emergency caused by the appearance of the white-pine blister rust in the white and sugar pine regions of the Pacific coast, threatening the extensive Federal holdings of these essential woods as well as private and State holdings, thus endangering the entire supply thereof, $150,000, which sum shall be available for investigation and control work on the white-pine blister rust in the white-pine and sugar-pine areas in the West, in such manner as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may best accomplish the suppression of the disease, and shall remain available until March 31, 1923: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the cost or value of trees or other property injured or destroyed. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to incur all necessary expenses, including the employment of such persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, in cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations, or individuals, as he may deem necessary to accomplish such purposes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am very much interested in the $150,000 appropriation made available for this investigation of the white-pine blister rust in the white and sugar pine regions of the West and Pacific coast. Although I was not successful in getting $50,000 in this bill for the same purpose in the East, I feel that this appropriation is right and is very much needed at the present time.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it has been demonstrated, as stated in the hearings, that the method adopted and employed for the eradication of this evil is successful?

Mr. SNELL. That is a hard question to answer, but they feel that to a certain extent they are controlling it in the East, but do not expect to entirely wipe it out. But they think that if they start early enough in the West they will be able to wipe it out, and that is the reason they want the $150,000 at this time, as the springtime is the most propitious time to do this exterminating work.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. If the gentleman will yield further, for I know that the gentleman is familiar with this subject, is this rust that is discussed in the hearings—and I have only examined it cursorily—is it as destructive to pine as is claimed?

Mr. SNELL. It will kill young pine right away, but the mature pine is not absolutely ruined for market for several years.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. This is a new thing to me, and we are all very much interested in the conservation of our white-pine timber and its growth. Does the gentleman know that the means which have already been employed have been effectual?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; they have been absolutely effectual where they have had money enough to carry them out. They can actually prevent the spread if the work is done properly and at the right time. The disease got the start of them in the East, and probably never will be entirely wiped out, but we hope to control it as much as possible; but if they have this emergency appropriation it is thought that they can stop it in the West.

Mr. DALLINGER. Why is it that the gentleman was unable to get the appropriation to stop this disease in the East?

Mr. SNELL. That is perhaps a fair question, but I went before the committee, and they think, as long as they provide $175,000 in the regular appropriation bill and that $50,000 of that would be available for work immediately, which will take care of the situation fairly satisfactorily in the East at the present. One object I had in rising at this time was to see if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations understands the situation the same as I do, namely, that if we make this appropriation of $150,000 for use in the West the other appropriation of $175,000 which is carried in the regular Agricultural appropriation bill is intended to be used in the North and the East.

Mr. MADDEN. My understanding is that in the Agricultural bill for 1923 there will be a provision carrying $175,000 to be used entirely in the North and in the East, some of which it is intended to have made immediately available. This item is for the extreme West. It appears that the pine blister rust is brought about largely through a beetle.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; and the spores fly from the pine tree to the currant bushes and back to the pine trees.

Mr. MADDEN. And the only way it can be extended to the tree is by having blackberry or currant bushes and things of that kind surrounding the trees. The disease is not transmitted from one tree to another, the scientists say; and it is to clear this undergrowth away from the trees, so that the disease can be eliminated, that this appropriation is proposed.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman on that; but I do not want to have any misunderstanding with regard to what is going to be done with a regular appropriation carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no misunderstanding. It is thoroughly clear to us.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, in the bill the language does not say that it is confined to work in the North and the East, but it is the understanding that that is where the $175,000 carried in the regular bill will be expended?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SNELL. And $50,000 of that will be made immediately available?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DOWELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28 to House bill 10267, the legislative appropriation bill.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Not to exceed $5,000 of the appropriation of $35,000 made in section 6 of the act approved March 4, 1921, entitled "An act to repeal and annul certain parts of the charter and lease granted and made to the Washington Market Co. by the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Washington Market Co.,' approved May 28, 1870," in addition to the sum not in excess of $3,500 provided for the same purpose by the act approved December 15, 1921 (Public, No. 399, 66th Cong.), is made available to enable the Attorney General to compensate expert witnesses and pay necessary expenses incident to the duties imposed upon him by section 7 of the said act approved March 4, 1921.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 22, line 10, strike out the word "sixty-sixth" and insert the word "sixty-seventh."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For refund of immigration fine erroneously assessed and collected from the United States Shipping Co., Norfolk, Va., $340.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 22, after the figures "$340" insert a new paragraph as follows:

"For the enforcement of the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, $150,000."

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that it is proposed to furlough all of the immigration inspectors for 30 days sometime between the 1st day of March and the 1st day of July. Anyone connected with or informed in respect to the Immigration Service knows that the immigration inspectors have been working very hard. A great many of the men have been working nights and Sundays to keep up with the work. As we know, the steamship companies have been bringing people over to this country even where the quota allowed for the different countries had been exceeded, and it has caused a very large amount of work to be thrown upon the officials concerned. I understand that through a mistake on the part of those having charge of the accounting in the Department of Labor there is a deficit of $150,000 just discovered, and in order to carry on the service until the 1st of July all of these men who have been working so faithfully and working overtime are to be rewarded for that faithful work by being laid off between now and the 1st of July for 30 days without pay. It seems to me it is pretty small business on the part of the United States Government to treat its employees in that way. The amendment that I have offered proposes to give the Department of Labor enough money so that these men, who it is admitted are needed to do the work, can be kept upon the pay roll for the full amount of their regular salary authorized by law until the 1st of July.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Why is it that the Immigration Bureau did not ask for this appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. They do not need any more money.

Mr. DALLINGER. I understand from the Commissioner General of Immigration that he did not think there was any use in asking for it. The Department of Labor received an additional appropriation of $300,000, as the gentleman knows, under the first deficiency appropriation act, and I presume they are probably ashamed that the mistake was made, but it is a fact. The commissioner general informs me that all of these inspectors are going to be laid off for 30 days between now and the 1st of July, and the first batch of them have been notified of that fact.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it would be good policy in making appropriations to appropriate money when the bureau involved does not think it important enough to come to Congress and make a representation as to the need for the appropriation?

Certainly the commissioner general has no way of determining whether or not the Congress would allow it unless he asked for it, and there has been no statement made to the committee, so far as I know, that he desires such an appropriation.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the Members of this House are concerned with the sort of treatment accorded Government employees. It is a fact that these men are going to be furloughed, the first division of them having been so notified; and I submit that it is not a fair, decent way to treat the employees of the Government. They were employed at these salaries fixed by law. Many of them have been in the service for many years, and the salaries that they receive are small, and now they are confronted with this situation: That after having worked overtime, without any extra compensation—because they do not get any extra compensation for overtime—having worked nights and Sundays because of this deficit in the Department of Labor, they are going to be furloughed for 30 days between now and the 1st of July. In other words, a whole month's pay will be taken away from them; and it seems to me, whether the Commissioner General of Immigration asked for this money at the time the hearings were held or not, that such treatment ought not to be allowed by the Congress. I understand that a similar amendment will be offered in the Senate if it is defeated here. In other words, I think Congress is concerned with having the employees of the Government treated decently; and this is not a decent way to treat them.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in November of last year there was certified to the Speaker of the House by the President of the United States, on the request of the Labor Department, a recommendation for the appropriation of $300,000 to carry on the work of the Immigration Bureau for the rest of the fiscal year 1922. Every dollar that they asked was given. They asked for $300,000 and they got it. They have not asked for any more. There is no information in the possession of the Committee on Appropriations that they need it. Nobody connected with the Labor Department has ever communicated directly or indirectly with anybody on the Committee on Appropriations so far as I know to say that they wanted that sum of money. Now, we are not mind readers, and I do not think it would be good practice for us to force the Labor Department to take money whether it wants it or not. Why should Congress urge the departments, that are always willing to take money, to come and ask for it. They will come fast enough without anybody asking them to do it. Our job should be to discourage them from coming. It is our function never to appropriate for any activity unless the appropriation is necessary. Now, we have no information from any source whatever, except the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts who lives close by an immigration district station and has probably felt the heartbeats of the immigration inspectors, who always have some doubts of what is going to happen to them in common with all other people who are on the Government pay roll.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any doubt in the gentleman's mind that there is enough money available to keep the necessary agents employed?

Mr. MADDEN. We can only judge. I have never seen any evidence on the part of any Government functionary of any modesty when he wants money. He comes and demands and pleads and argues and uses every power that he knows how to use, and if he does not get what he wants he generally wires to somebody to wire to somebody else, and you get a flood of telegrams as the result of his wiring that there is need for something when there is no justification for it. Every telegram you get urging you to do something generally originates here. It does not originate anywhere else. These departments have a sense of smell that prompts them to send telegrams to every place in the United States from which they think a telegram may come back to you to tell you to do something you ought not to do, and these telegrams you have been getting in connection with this proposed amendment of $150,000 are the result of that sort of propaganda. Now, why do not these men in the departments who are the responsible management come to the Congress and ask for it? Why do not they go to the Budget officer, why do they not go to the President, prove their case, have it certified, and let it be considered in the only legitimate way that it should be considered?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee on the subject of things that ought not to be done.

Mr. MADDEN. Go right along.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I observe in this bill there are several items included for payment——

Mr. MADDEN. This amendment is pending.

Mr. MACGREGOR. This is connected with this subject. Here is a refund of an immigration fine erroneously assessed and collected——

Mr. MADDEN. I would be delighted to inform the gentleman about that.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I am not interested in the particular item.

Mr. MADDEN. There are several items of that sort——

Mr. MACGREGOR. I am interested in the practice which we rebelled against or tried to rebel against last year, of having claims propositions tacked on bills.

Mr. MADDEN. There are not claims. Here is the situation. A ship comes into the port. The immigration officer at the port decides that the captain of the ship has violated a port regulation, and he imposes a fine. Immediately upon the imposition of the fine the money must be deposited with the proper official of the Government.

The case is not tried at all after that happens, and when the case is tried the money is already in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MANN. I think ordinarily the money is retained and refunded if necessary, but sometimes erroneously paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Maybe that is true, but there is no trial of the case until after the money is deposited. If the money was held in the port by the local officials and the case was tried while it was in their hands, they could pay it back themselves, but if it was paid into the Treasury of course there is no way after the trial in which to show the man on whom the fine was imposed was not guilty, except in this way.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Can that not go through the Claims Committee?

Mr. MADDEN. This is not a claim.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Take, on page 34, the claim of the Harriman National Bank——

Mr. MADDEN. I will explain that. That is a peculiar situation. The Alaska Railroad management way up there in the frozen north generally carry about $100,000 in current funds to meet their daily obligations. They used to carry them in their pockets. They had no place in which to store them. There happened to be a bank in Fairbanks, I think, named the Harriman National Bank. It had a capital of $25,000. The Government wanted to deposit their daily funds, amounting to about $100,000, in this bank. They agreed to accept it. The order went out to make the bank the Government depository, and then it was discovered that they did not have either securities or capital enough to guarantee the safety of the deposit. Well, it so happened that this bank in Alaska, having the same name, was the correspondent of the Harriman National Bank in New York, and having no other relation to it except correspondent. The bank in Alaska suggested to the officials of the Treasury that the Harriman National Bank in New York would probably be glad to guarantee the safety of the funds if they deposited them up there. So the Secretary of the Treasury asked the Harriman National Bank in New York if they would do this. They said that they would as a matter of accommodation to the Government. They did not have the money, so they gave security for the deposits in this bank. They did not have the money on deposit.

Then the Secretary of the Treasury sent the contract over to the Harriman National Bank in New York. One of the provisions of the contract was that 2 per cent interest should be paid on deposits which they guaranteed in another bank, and the Harriman National Bank wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury saying they would not pay the interest, because they did not have the money, but that they would give any security for the safekeeping of the money in the other bank. And the Secretary of the Treasury forgot to reply to the letter and correct the conditions that existed. So it went along, and the bookkeeper in charge of the payment of interest on monthly balances in the Harriman National Bank automatically every month sent a check from the Harriman National Bank to the Secretary of the Treasury for the payment of the interest on the balances on deposit when they had not any balances on deposit. They had not anything on deposit, and it was not discovered for quite a long while. And the Treasury Department says, of course, they never should have received the money and the Harriman National Bank never should have paid the money. There was no obligation on their part to pay it, and the other bank had nothing to do except to conserve the daily interests of their railroad company up there, and without any interest charges whatever. So, you see, there is nothing to do but pay it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Illinois one question. I ask unanimous consent that he have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR] has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALLINGER. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois when the hearings on this appropriation bill closed?

Mr. MADDEN. I will tell the gentleman if I can. I do not have the exact date, but I will say that it was about a week ago—about the 21st of February.

Mr. DALLINGER. I am informed as to this matter that it was not known that these furloughs were necessary until after the hearings were closed on this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. They did not come to us.

Mr. DALLINGER. Do I understand that no one connected with the Department of Labor ever brought this matter to your attention?

Mr. MADDEN. Absolutely. The gentleman has a definite understanding of it.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question? The Department of Labor knows how much money it has and how many employees it has, and have they not enough of efficiency to divide the two and find out if there is enough money appropriated to keep those employees in service, with or without a furlough?

Mr. DALLINGER. I am informed that they discovered there was a mistake of $150,000, within 10 days or two weeks.

Mr. MANN. That is not a good reason for giving them $150,000. If they can not keep their accounts, they ought to have some one who can keep them.

Mr. DALLINGER. I am informed that these men are going to be furloughed. I am not blaming the committee, the department never having called their attention to this matter.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course they did not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHILDREN'S BUREAU.

For carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy, and for other purposes," approved November 23, 1921, including printing and binding, $370,000: Provided, That no salary shall be paid from the portion of this appropriation allotted for administrative purposes at a rate exceeding $2,400 per annum except the following: One at $3,600, one at $3,500, and one at $3,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TOWNER: Page 26, line 3, strike out the amount "$370,000" and insert in lieu thereof the amount "$730,000."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in order to call attention to a proposition that I think ought to be submitted to the committee. It really is a question of the interpretation of the law. The law for the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy provided a fund in two parts, one of them the sum of $480,000 for the first year to be divided among the States in sums of $10,000 to each State. In regard to this particular part of the authorization it was provided that this amount was to go to the States without any cooperation or corresponding appropriation on their part. Then there was provided a further fund of $1,000,000, which was to be divided among the States according to their population, provided they made an appropriation of a like sum. The $10,000 that was appropriated for the first year was intended really for the institution of the service in the States. The Committee on Appropriations, in considering the matter, especially the $1,000,000, took the view that while it should be divided among the States, that as this particular fiscal year expired on the 30th day of June they ought not to appropriate more than a proportionate amount for the remainder of the year.

I am inclined to think that there is a great deal of justification for that view. However, the committee also made a like distribution of the $480,000 fund. I am inclined to think that such a determination is hardly a fair interpretation of the law. It was intended that this preliminary amount should be used for the institution of the service among the States. If now only one-quarter of this amount is given to the States for institutional purposes, if they all accept it, they will receive only $2,500 each instead of what was intended, the amount of $10,000 for the institution of this service in each State.

I am inclined to think that there will be a very great disappointment among the people who are very greatly interested in this bill if that view shall prevail in the committee.

There is a further proposition that really——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I will ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The law provides that $480,000 shall be distributed by the States without the necessity of cooperation for the first year, and after that the sum of $240,000 shall be distributed for the second year. Now, the bill which will be passed, the regular annual appropriation bill, will carry an appropriation for the States. If the gentleman's contention is correct, would it not result in appropriating the $480,000 plus $240,000 for 15 months instead of for 3 months?

Mr. TOWNER. That will be the effect if this sum is to be considered in the same light as the other sum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It would seem to me that this being a deficiency bill, and taking care only of a portion of the fiscal year, under the proper construction of the law we could only appropriate for the proportionate part of the year, and not the entire year.

Mr. TOWNER. I admit that the gentleman's view is correct in regard to the sum that is to be apportioned among the States upon what might be called the permanent basis. But it occurs to me that it might be a fair interpretation that each State would be entitled to the full amount of money provided in the act for the institution of the service, and unless that interpretation is taken of the law it will deprive them of what really was intended by the passage of the law.

I think the committee has acted very fairly regarding the matter. I am quite sure the Appropriations Committee has endeavored to give to the Children's Bureau all that they thought the Children's Bureau is entitled to, and I am simply presenting this matter for the full committee's determination. I believe that it will be a very great disappointment to those who are interested in the law and its institution and enforcement, and I am very much afraid that it may seriously handicap them in the institution of this service in the States. For that reason I am submitting the matter for such interpretation as the committee may give to the law. Of course, the original act is merely an authorization. The determination of the matter comes up on the appropriation, as is now being done. It is for the committee to determine as to whether or not a fair interpretation of the law would entitle the States to this $10,000 each which was provided for in the act.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it may be fair to say that the question at issue is one of interpretation of the law. The question is how you would interpret the act under which this appropriation is being proposed.

There is one provision of the act which says that so much of the amount apportioned to any State for any fiscal year that remains unpaid at the close thereof shall remain available for expenditure in that State until the close of the fiscal year. In considering the duty imposed on the Committee on Appropriations the members of the committee had no desire whatever to embarrass the activity that is proposed under this act. We interpreted the law to say that for the first year there should be $480,000, or $10,000 allotted to each State without reference to population, and we considered that to mean that it was for the entire fiscal year. Now, whether we construed it improperly or not I do not know, but that is the way we construed it. It was not done with any intention to embarrass the activity, but rather to carry out the law as we understood it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me it could not be construed to apply to the entire fiscal year, because part of the fiscal year had gone by when the act was passed, so that the committee and the Congress should take into consideration the fact that part of the year had already passed when the bill was enacted and should keep that in mind.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. The question is, What is a fiscal year? That is a matter of construction. Is it three months?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think I am correct in stating that the committee which reported this bill assumed that the entire amount authorized would be appropriated for the first fiscal year or any remaining part of it, and would not be apportioned according to what there might be remaining of the fiscal year at the time the appropriation should be brought in; because it was realized that in order to get this work started it would take a larger sum to begin with than would be available if you appropriated only for the remaining three months of the fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, it would not be fair to appropriate that part of the $1,000,000 that is authorized in this bill for more than the three months, but it might not be unfair to appropriate the $480,000 which gives a $10,000 allotment to each State.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I think we may have erred in that. I do not say that we did err, but if we did, it was because we wanted to be overcautious; not that we wanted to discriminate; but we wanted to see that the law was not violated by us.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that if the bill is passed as it is brought in it will make no provision for the $10,000 for each State, except that portion of it that would be allotted for the last three months?

Mr. MADDEN. That is right. It would give them only $2,500 for each of those States, and the reason why we reached that conclusion was this: In the first place we thought we were construing the law properly. In the next place, there are only 6 States that have accepted, and 35 States the governors of which have indicated a friendly interest, but have not accepted because they have not the power to accept. In any case, if you allotted this money or appropriated it, they could not apportion it, because I assume they can not apportion the money until the State comes within the terms of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like two or three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. When the gentleman says six States have accepted, he means that the legislatures of those States have definitely accepted the provisions of this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and 35 States have been communicated with through their governors.

Mr. BARKLEY. In some States they may have provisions relieving the legislature of the necessity of affirmatively accepting the provisions of the bill by reason of appropriations already made.

Mr. MADDEN. As far as our information goes that condition does not exist anywhere. I think the witness before our committee indicated that the governors had communicated with the bureau but only tentatively accepted on condition that the legislature approve.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague [Mr. MADDEN] allow me to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the maternity bill had become a law on June 29, providing for $10,000 for the current fiscal year, when it would be impossible to make the appropriation during the current fiscal year. Then what would happen?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, I do not think anybody would be technical enough to argue that the entire amount should be appropriated for the one day remaining of the fiscal year, especially if the deficiency bill was not brought in until after the new fiscal year began. But that is not the case here. This work will require more money to begin with, to get started, than it will for any like period after it is begun.

Mr. MANN. That may be, but it is perfectly manifest that this money will not be expended to any extent during this fiscal year. Now, there will be an appropriation of $5,000 for each State for the next fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. And $2,500 in this bill for each State.

Mr. MANN. If they got the full $10,000 they would get $15,000 practically for the next fiscal year.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether I understood him correctly to say that any portion of this $10,000 not used by the State this year would be available to the same State next year, in addition to the $10,000 which it would get normally?

Mr. MANN. The law provides, as I understand it—my colleague [Mr. MADDEN] will know better than I—that an appropriation for one fiscal year if not expended during that fiscal year is available during the next fiscal year.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; but does the gentleman construe the fact that we do not appropriate the entire amount for the current fiscal year as allowing what is not appropriated this year to go over and be available for next year?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I do not think that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then your construction is that only that part of the $2,500 that you now provide which is not used during this year will be available for next year?

Mr. MADDEN. If they made an allotment of this $2,500 this year, of course that would be available for next year, and $5,000 more next year.

Mr. MANN. If I may make the suggestion, whatever the reasons may have been—and I assume there were good reasons—the act contemplated an expenditure of $10,000 by each State during the first year that it was in operation, and thereafter $5,000. Why is not that the proper thing to do here, because no part of this, or practically very little of it, will be expended this fiscal year? Make the appropriations now equal to $5,000 for this fiscal year, which will amount to $10,000 to be expended during the next fiscal year. It will be added as an expenditure for the next fiscal year, and that practically gives them $10,000 for the first year.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is an excellent suggestion, and I am willing to accept it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 3, strike out the amount of $370,000 and insert in lieu thereof $490,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this suggestion to my colleague and gentlemen specially interested in this law: The maternity act provides for two classes of appropriations—one to be paid to the States direct, regardless of population, and the other to be divided among the States in the ratio of population, or whatever it is. This item is one lump sum. How will the bureau know how to divide this item? I should think the item ought to be in some way divided.

Mr. TOWNER. I have no objection to its being divided.

Mr. MANN. I think if it is not divided the bureau will not know how to divide it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass over this item for the present until we can work out the proper language dividing the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to pass over the item for the present.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the whole item be left open not only for the consideration of this amendment but for the consideration of other amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph is passed over to be again returned to, subject to any amendment. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For 1921, $518,500; for 1922, $1,600,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to have the chairman tell us what this $1,600,000 for 1922 is for, and what the $518,500 for 1921 is for.

Mr. MADDEN. That is freight on all sources of supplies, food, equipment, clothing, and everything except fuel, for the Navy Department.

Mr. SNELL. The reason I ask is a constituent of mine had a small claim against the Navy Department that was allowed for supplies during the war. He received a letter saying there was no money available to pay it, and I wondered if this would cover it.

Mr. MADDEN. There is one claim in here of $5,000——

Mr. SNELL. This was an account for supplies. There was no question about it; they simply said they had no money available to pay it.

Mr. MADDEN. This covers everything of that kind; it is all in this bill, and it consists of a lot of items.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fuel and transportation: For coal and other fuel for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same; maintenance and general operation of machinery of naval fuel depots and fuel plants; water for all purposes on board naval vessels; and ice for the cooling of water, including the expense of transportation and storage of both, $6,282,685.33.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the committee, a question. I suppose this is to take care of the situation where the Navy finds itself without money for fuel. I want to ask the gentleman if this will enable them to have joint maneuvers in the Pacific and Atlantic as contemplated.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it would. Those joint maneuvers were called off some time ago by order of the President.

Mr. HICKS. They were called off in July by reason of a lack of fuel.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know about that, but I know they were called off.

Mr. HICKS. This would allow the independent maneuvers of each fleet, would it not?

Mr. MADDEN. The individual maneuvers are all over; there are no more maneuvers to be had, and this will enable the department to use $1,250,000 a month for fuel for the next five months. Two million five hundred thousand dollars was the highest sum they used in a month last year, and oil then was about $3 a barrel compared with $1.60 a barrel now. When the estimates for fuel supply for the fiscal year of 1922 were made they were made on a basis of $3.85 a barrel for fuel oil, and now it has gone down to $1.80 on the west coast, and practically all the ships burning oil are on the west coast. Those that are not on the west coast are in reserve. It is the judgment of the committee that it will give the Navy Department such an amount of fuel as ought to be expended for all proper discharge of naval functions between now and the 30th day of June.

Mr. HICKS. And this, with the amount already appropriated for this fiscal year, amounts to about $24,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. About that; yes.

Mr. HICKS. Of that original amount for this year, practically all of it has been expended, up to about the 15th of February.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I understand.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the word "the," where it occurs the second time in line 22 on page 29, will be changed to the word "this."

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

For fuel and repairs to heating, lighting, ice, and power plant, including repairs to elevators, purchase and exchange of tools, and electrical supplies, and removal of ashes, $4,000.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations why the recommendation of the post-office authorities to the committee that an appropriation be made for continuing the tube service has been denied?

Mr. MADDEN. There was pending before the committee that is in charge of this bill a recommendation for the reinstallation of the tube system in New York City, but it was admitted by the Post Office Department that it is not a deficiency, in the first instance, and it was also admitted that it changes the law and thereby involves legislation. Regardless of what the merits of the subject might be, it was not within the jurisdiction of this subcommittee or of the Committee on Appropriations to report the item which they suggested.

Mr. COCKRAN. Then it was left out purely as a matter of parliamentary procedure?

Mr. MADDEN. Parliamentary procedure was one of the reasons why it was left out. We would not have been able under the circumstances to justify the item under the rules of the House as a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. COCKRAN. And I suppose the committee took the ground that it supplied no deficiency?

Mr. MADDEN. In the first place it is legislation. The existing law giving the authority to the Post Office Department to use tubes provides that not to exceed $17,500 per annum per mile shall be paid for the use of the tubes. Their proposal was to pay $18,500 per mile up to $19,500 per mile, and more later. That would be an amendment to the law, and the Committee on Appropriations having no jurisdiction over bills that create legislation refuse to accept jurisdiction. There is no question about the fact that we have no jurisdiction at all.

Mr. COCKRAN. Of course, if there is no jurisdiction in the committee, that is abundant reason for not having it reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payment to Harriman National Bank, of New York, N. Y.: To refund to the Harriman National Bank, of New York, N. Y., the sum erroneously paid into the United States Treasury by the claimant bank as interest on deposits of public moneys from April 18, 1918, to June 30, 1920, $4,950.04.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 25 of the bill, to the item providing for the Children's Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment which I have at the desk and offer in its stead the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TOWNER: Page 26, line 3, strike out the figures "$370,000," and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$490,000," and the following: "of which sum $240,000 shall be for equal apportionment among the States without reference to population, and $250,000 shall be for apportionment among the States with reference to population and for administrative expenses in accordance with said act."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the committee has no objection to the amendment as now presented.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment for the purpose of making a few observations. My understanding of the maternity bill provisions is that there was an initial appropriation authorized of $10,000 to each one of the 48 States of the Union that comply with the provisions of the Federal law for the first year, and that the further sum of $1,000,000 is to be apportioned in accordance with the population of the States. For the second year there is to be apportioned to the complying States, without regard to population, an initial sum of $5,000, and then an additional amount for the second year in proportion to the population, and so on, during the period of five years, the theory of the law being that to encourage the States to get this work under way Congress would appropriate a fixed amount to aid the States, without regard to population, in starting the work, and that Congress would in addition match the appropriation made by the States in accordance with figures based on population. The maternity bill, as I recall, passed the House during the latter days of the first session of this Congress. The fiscal year then had run on something like four or five months. If we had intended that something less than the sum of $10,000 was to be apportioned to each State as an initial appropriation, we would have used language so providing, but appreciating the fact that we were then on the current fiscal year we then advisedly used these words—

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the current fiscal year, $480,000.

That is, we authorized to be appropriated the sum of $480,000 for the present fiscal year. That is clear and plain. There is a direct authorization for $480,000. How is that to be apportioned according to the law? It is to be equally apportioned among the several States. There is nothing in the act, there is nothing in the general law, so far as I have been able to find, which provides that the ordinary law pertaining to deficiencies shall apply to money appropriated by the Federal Government to the several States which the several States shall have the power and right to expend.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the gentleman would be willing to concede that the apportionment to the State could not be made until after the State had come within the provisions of the act?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Exactly.

Mr. MADDEN. And there are six States that have come within the provisions of the act.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; I am so informed. But under my understanding of the law it is only those States which have come within the provisions of the law that are entitled to any money under the act. Now, it is my contention—and in that I differ with the chairman of the committee; we did not understand each other yesterday—that when a State in this, the current fiscal year, complies with the Federal law it is then entitled not to what the Committee on Appropriations may determine to give them but to an equal share of the amount apportioned to the 48 States.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The Committee on Appropriations do not determine to give anything. The Committee on Appropriations only recommends to the House.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I know. I have agreed with the Committee on Appropriations on many occasions myself. I can well appreciate the fact that the action of the committee comes before the House with a great deal of weight. I would point out——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, I was just wondering—of course, I do not know that the question I am going to ask has any sense to it—whether the fact that we only appropriate $240,000, because we intend to give $10,000 to each State as of the 1st of next July, would prevent, when all the conditions under the law have been complied with and all organization is complete, the authorities from giving to the State that has complied any additional amount that is authorized to be paid under the act?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If I understand the gentleman's position, it is this: He contends that under this $480,000 authorization, that because eight months of this year have gone by——

Mr. MADDEN. Nine when we get through the bill.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Whatever it is, that there should only be paid to the States three-twelfths of the $480,000, and that should be apportioned equally?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In just a moment. Under the amendment it would be only half, and it is much better than the original provision; but I still maintain that under the law as we intended it and as I think it has been written the initial appropriation of $10,000 should be made to any State actually complying within the one-year period.

Mr. MANN. Was not the purpose of the act to give $10,000 to each State for the first year of the operation of the law and $5,000 thereafter?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is my understanding.

Mr. MANN. Is not that practically carried out by giving them $5,000 for this fiscal year, $5,000 for the next fiscal year. They get $10,000 for the first year the law is in operation. Suppose the law was to become effective June 29, as it could easily have been——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman claim they ought to have $15,000 for the first fiscal year?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I contend under the law they were entitled to $10,000 this year and $5,000 the next year.

Mr. MANN. Under the law they are entitled to what we appropriate. The general authorization would permit the making of an appropriation for $10,000 for this fiscal year and $5,000 for the next, but the theory of the law was to give them $10,000 for the initial year the law was in operation. Now it is not in operation yet, and it will not be during this fiscal year.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will say in the State of Minnesota it has been in operation for something over a year.

Mr. MANN. The law may have been on the statute books, but it is not in practical operation, I mean.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. They have been ready to use the money.

Mr. MANN. You will not use it during this fiscal year, the $10,000. Now that the appropriation for this fiscal year runs over to the next fiscal year under the law, they get under this amendment $10,000 practically for the first year the law is being operated. That was the theory of the law, and we carry out that theory.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is being carried out better in the amendment than in the bill as it came from the Committee on Appropriations, but at the same time I feel for the purpose of promoting this work that it was the intent to give the States $10,000 to start out with and each year thereafter $5,000.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, the bill was introduced in Congress in the last fiscal year, and it might have become a law on the 29th of June last.

The theory of the bill was to give $10,000 for the first year the law was in operation to each State in order to start it into operation, and $5,000 a year thereafter. Now if we give $10,000 for the next 15 months, considering the time it takes to put the law into operation they will be getting $10,000 for the first year to carry out the theory of the law.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Let me ask the gentleman this question: The initial appropriation for the second year is $5,000. Now, there will be a large number of States who, if they comply with the law at all, will comply with it some time during the second year.

Mr. MANN. And this appropriation holds over for the second year.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This present appropriation of $5,000 would hold over until then?

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the law expressly provides that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Now, would the apportionment on the second provision of $5,000 be prorated for only a portion of next year?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the full amount would be appropriated.

Mr. TOWNER. It has all passed the House.

Mr. MADDEN. They would get the $10,000 under this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. I agree with the gentleman in the interpretation of the law. I think the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois is so much better than the bill that it would be best for us and fairly satisfactory to the people who are interested.

Mr. MADDEN. We are very happy to cooperate.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I shall vote for the amendment, because I think it is much better than the original provision, but I merely wanted to state my own opinion of what in my judgment was intended when the bill was passed.

Mr. MADDEN. The Committee on Appropriations is always willing to be complimented on its parsimony.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the modified amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RAMSEYER. May we have the amendment again reported?

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOSPITALS.

Fort Mackenzie, Wyo., Public Health Service Hospital: For repairs and alterations of existing buildings, and mechanical equipment, approaches, etc., an additional sum of $100,000 is made available from the appropriation contained in the act approved March 4, 1921.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve a point of order on this section for the moment.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. SNELL. In looking over the hearings, Mr. Wetmore, who seems to be advocating this appropriation, states that it is for remodeling buildings, and so forth and so on, to double the capacity of the hospital at the present time, and also provide a certain amount for recreation, and so forth. Could that legitimately come in here on a deficiency appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. This is a great plant, a million-dollar plant, at Fort Mackenzie, taken over by the Public Health Service for the Veterans' Bureau. Of the $18,600,000 authorized for expenditure some time ago for hospital purposes, $600,000 was allotted to Walla Walla and to Fort Mackenzie. The presumption was that a reasonably equitable proportion would be made between the two places.

Mr. SNELL. Yet I understand, after they made that allotment, they got additional information that there were not enough men in the vicinity of Fort Mackenzie to really need the additional amount.

Mr. MADDEN. The place is crowded, and they have already spent $108,000 out of the allotment, and unless they spend $100,000 more the work will be incomplete. Now, we propose to make this allotment out of the $861,000 yet unallotted out of the $18,600,000, and it ought to be done beyond any question. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that the hospital board, after they looked over this matter and had gone into it very thoroughly, thought it was a mistake to spend any more money at Fort Mackenzie, and for that reason the original allotment was reduced.

Mr. MADDEN. That was not the information we had, I am sorry to say, because we would be glad to save this if we could, but we could not justify the refusal.

Mr. SNELL. You take the whole surrounding country that is contiguous to Fort Mackenzie, and, as I understood from the original plans they had down there in this hospitalization board, there were very few soldiers to be sent to that institution.

Mr. MADDEN. There are lots of them there.

Mr. SNELL. They are there, but they are sent from long distances when they ought to be hospitalized nearer home.

Mr. MADDEN. While they are there they have got to be provided for.

Mr. SNELL. If we have as many beds as the gentleman spoke of yesterday, why should we provide for Fort Mackenzie, when the men could be as well taken care of nearer home?

Mr. MADDEN. Seventy-eight hundred beds means about 20 per cent surplus, and all the doctors everywhere will say we must have at least 15 per cent surplus beds in order to accommodate the patients that come to the various places.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of the Army and its supplies: The amounts allotted for animal-drawn transportation and motor transportation by the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922 are made available during such fiscal year for rail transportation in the amounts required to provide the following: The sum of $511,892.77 for returning surplus officers and enlisted men from Germany and making such movements of troops as become necessary therefrom to meet the most pressing needs of the Government, and the sum of $150,000 for expenditures made during the months of September and October, 1921, in connection with the West Virginia mine troubles.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "Germany," in line 24. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] if he has in his possession what the policy of the Government is in reference to the retention of the troops now in Germany?

Mr. MADDEN. Most of the troops have been ordered home. I do not know how many there are to remain, but the appropriation provided for here is to transport the troops that are on the way home, or are ordered home, to their various stations after they reach here.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. After they reach here?

Mr. MADDEN. After they reach American soil. There is no provision here for the transportation of troops across the sea; but if we do not allow this item here, they would not be able to send them to the different places in the country to which they are to go.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that, in line 24, the language is:

For returning surplus officers and enlisted men from Germany and making such movement of troops as becomes necessary therefrom to meet the most pressing needs of the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. Railroad transportation here is part of their return. There is not any provision here for transportation across the ocean. It is just for the transportation on land after they reach here.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Has the gentleman from Illinois any information as to what the policy of the Government is as to how long the troops are to be kept in Germany? As I understand it, the United States is now at peace with Germany, and I am rather curious to know just what the real status of the American Army is in German territory. I am not criticizing the attitude of the Government, because there may be reasons why they should remain, but it does seem to me that the Congress ought to have more information in making appropriations for the Army, which we will have to do in a short time, as to what the Government's policy is going to be with reference to retaining the Army on German territory long after we are at peace with that nation.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say to the gentleman from Texas that the Army bill for the fiscal year 1923 is under consideration in our committee, and all of this question is being gone into very carefully. I think we shall be able to come in here with some definite information for the gentleman within the next 10 days. We expect to report the Army appropriation bill within 10 days and take it up for consideration.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that I am very glad to hear that statement. I do not care to criticize the fact of the troops being there. It may be very proper, but it does seem to me that the Congress, since it has no control over the question where the troops shall be sent, and has control only over its appropriations, ought to have some knowledge as to what the policy of the President will be with reference to keeping troops in German territory. If they are to be kept there under the treaty of Versailles, they might be kept there, as I understand it, for 15 years. If they are to be kept there at the request of the Allies——

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that they can not be brought back too soon to suit me.

Mr. MANN. We have been trying to get that information for several years. My colleague holds out the hope that it will be furnished in 10 days.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is no more extravagant than the idea expressed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] yesterday as to the progress that has been made by the present administration in other directions since it came into power.

Mr. MANN. In the one case the information will be forthcoming within 10 days, and in the other case we have been asking for it in vain for several years.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that it is encouraging to hear that we will get this information in 10 days, because we have been attempting to get it without avail since 1919.

Mr. MADDEN. I can assure the gentleman from Texas that we will get that information for his benefit within that time.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am thankful for small favors and will be thankful for this when it comes. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I notice in the Washington Post this morning a statement to the effect that the Allies were going to close up the German factories which are manufacturing the large lighter-than-air balloons and are going to forbid them making the balloons such as they have been constructing for the company which contemplates an air-line service with lighter-than-air craft from New York to Chicago because of the possibility of those machines carrying bombs in war time. Does the gentleman know whether or not the United States Government has adopted a policy of preventing the manufacture of these lighter-than-air craft?

Mr. MADDEN. I am sorry I can not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I notice that the morning Post uses it as in the nature of a piece of news with reference to the attitude of the Allies with respect to the manufacture of lighter-than-air craft.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it would be wise for a man to guide his actions through life by what he reads in the newspapers.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is the reason why I wanted the information. I thought the gentleman, perhaps, would be able to give me more information on this than he has given in the past. The gentleman knows that a corporation has been organized which has for its purpose the establishment of a passenger service with these large balloons or dirigibles, whatever they may be called, between New York and Chicago, and this article this morning attempted to give the news that this was all going to be done away with and the factory scrapped and its supplies on hand required to be thrown aside by virtue of the simple fact that these passenger-carrying aircraft are of such a nature that they could carry large supplies of bombs in the event of war. It seems to me that is going a long way toward destroying an industry that ought to be regarded as perfectly legitimate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Not exceeding $236,095 of unobligated balances of appropriations for the support and operation of the Quartermaster Corps of the Army for the fiscal year 1921 may be applied to reconditioning the United States Army transport Madawaska.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "transport" in line 8. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois as to where this reconditioning is to be had, in a Government yard or in a private yard?

Mr. MADDEN. It is in a Government yard. I will say that it is on the ways, and has been since last November.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

For the handling and transportation of ordnance stores in connection with the evacuation of the ordnance depots located at or near South Amboy, Hammonton, and Westville, N. J.; Middletown and Tullytown, Pa.; Seven Pines and Penniman, Va.; Sparta, Wis.; and Toledo, Ohio, $1,642,351.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANHAM: Page 37, line 16, after the figures "$1,642,351," insert a new paragraph, as follows:
"Air Service: For experimentation, conservation, and production of helium, $150,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for reserving the point of order, although I do not concede that a point of order would be good against the amendment.

I wish that the Members of this House had studied with the same serious care that I have this helium proposition, because that study forces the realization of the importance of this project. The helium plant at Fort Worth, Tex., which is the only one in the world which produces helium in quantities, was closed on the 30th day of last November because of a lack of sufficient appropriations to continue it in operation. In the brief five months of its operation, despite the fact that the helium project is entirely a new one, more than 2,000,000 cubic feet of this new chemical element were extracted at that plant. The plant is now in a stand-by condition, and the personnel necessarily more or less scattered by reason of the closing. The helium for which we have contracted is being wasted very largely through commercial use of the gas which contains it. Both the time and the helium that this Government is thus losing will never be brought back to us. We have a practical monopoly of the world's sources of supply of helium, this wonderful inert element which makes aerial transportation with lighter-than-air craft absolutely safe and explosions impossible. The cost of the extraction of it from the natural gas which contains it has been brought down to a very low figure.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I would just like to inform the gentleman from Texas that a very thorough investigation of this question is being made by the military subcommittee of our committee. The whole question is being gone into thoroughly. I hope the gentleman will wait, because we are going to have a bill in here in a week, and it ought not to be on this bill.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee has given consideration and attention to this matter, but that is for the next fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. In the meantime the helium that is going off in the natural gas that is used commercially is being lost, and there is no way to save it unless it is saved by the present operation of the plant.

Mr. MADDEN. But there has been no request made by any executive branch of the Government for an appropriation to cover the activity provided for in the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. LANHAM. Such requests as were made for appropriations by the War Department were submitted to the committee before the recent Roma disaster which plunged the whole Nation in grief.

Mr. MADDEN. There was nothing to prevent them from sending in a supplemental estimate if they wanted to do so.

Mr. LANHAM. That may be true.

Mr. MADDEN. And they are making an investigation now of the cause of the disaster, and of a lot of other things, and our committee is making investigations as to the whole subject, and it seems to me that the orderly process would be to wait until we get through with this examination that we are making.

Mr. LANHAM. May I ask the gentleman if the Director of the Budget, upon the solicitation of the Secretaries of the various departments from which the helium board is made up, has not made a recommendation to the committee that for the next fiscal year we continue our operation for helium production?

Mr. MADDEN. I was just saying that the subcommittee having charge of appropriations for the War Department is giving consideration to all of these questions now, and will soon be able to report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The subcommittee in preparation of the appropriation bill for the War Department gave an audience to the gentleman to present his views of the need of further production of helium. The committee has not determined what the policy should be for the next year. Certainly there is no deficiency. I make this remark in connection with the point of order. There are 2,500,000 cubic feet of helium in store. As the gentleman knows, it would have taken 1,500,000 feet of helium to fill the Roma.

Mr. LANHAM. One million two hundred thousand feet.

Mr. STAFFORD. One million two hundred thousand feet. There is more money available for aircraft than can be expended during the fiscal year or than will be expended, and yet the gentleman is offering an amendment under the guise of a deficiency appropriation when there is no deficiency.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, that would come up on the point of order. I think it is clear from the law that there is a deficiency. But I will say in reply to the gentleman that the Committee on Appropriations has been considering the appropriation for the next fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely.

Mr. LANHAM. This amendment is offered for the operation of this plant for the remainder of this fiscal year. The plant was operated up until November 30, and closed at that time for the lack of sufficient funds to continue the operation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not, as I understand, for the lack of sufficient funds, but because the War Department saw fit to discontinue that operation under the economy program.

Mr. LANHAM. As I understand it, the War Department had expended that part of the appropriation for helium conservation and extraction embraced in the Army appropriation bill for this fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I set forth further that there is no limitation on the total sum appropriated for helium production.

Mr. LANHAM. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman to page 6 of the present law in this regard, where out of a lump-sum appropriation for several different purposes it is provided that—not exceeding $250,000 may be expended for experimentation, conservation, and production of helium.

And this amendment is offered to provide $150,000 for the remainder of the fiscal year, the $250,000 appropriated in the Army appropriation bill for this year not having been sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no deficiency, and the gentleman is asking for more money than was appropriated. The Congress determined the amount of money that should be used for this purpose, and there is no deficiency.

Mr. LANHAM. That amount of money has been used and it was not sufficient, and if I understand the purpose of a deficiency bill it is to make provision to carry on those various projects during the fiscal year for which appropriations were originally made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two further with reference to the importance of this subject and to impress upon the membership of this House that we are losing the helium and we are losing the time. The plant is in a stand-by condition, deteriorating, despite the fact that in the short period of its operation we extracted more than 2,000,000 cubic feet of this product. Recent developments in this matter show several things. The flights made by the C–7, the Navy dirigible, have demonstrated the superiority of helium over hydrogen, not only because of its noninflammability, which makes explosion impossible, but also from the fact that it does not contract and expand as hydrogen does, and it is not lost by valving, and the whole process of aerial navigation with it is much safer and is greatly facilitated.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is Fort Worth the only place where helium can be extracted?

Mr. LANHAM. No, sir; it is not; but at Fort Worth is the only plant in the United States and the only plant in the world that is now available for quantity production of helium.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think we ought to construct a plant wherever helium can be produced, to keep it from going to waste?

Mr. LANHAM. I do not, but I think we ought properly to conserve our helium.

Mr. MANN. I am a helium enthusiast, but I do not think we ought to make a deficiency appropriation here for it.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. I am also a helium enthusiast, and I am interested in the statement just made by the gentleman which, if it is true, violates all known laws heretofore existing as applying to the expansion or contraction of gases. The gentleman stated that helium did not expand or contract, as did hydrogen. My information when I studied chemistry was that all gases expanded alike with an increase of temperature or with the lowering of the barometric pressure.

Mr. LANHAM. In reply to the gentleman I will say that I can not answer him in technical terms, because my education has been along the line of the arts rather than the sciences; but, as I understand, helium is much more satisfactory in that you do not have to valve it as you do hydrogen, and not one cubic foot of helium has been lost in the C-7 since it was filled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is the gentleman aware that the plant at Fort Worth is not in a proper condition to produce helium on a commercial basis?

Mr. LANHAM. I am not aware of it.

Mr. ANTHONY. That was the evidence before the committee, and that it would require a considerable amount of money to put it in a proper condition.

Mr. LANHAM. Is not that because of the fact that we did not appropriate a sufficient amount originally to run it? And yet up to November 30 we extracted more than 2,000,000 cubic feet of helium.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman must concede that inasmuch as we have spent over $10,000,000 since the war started in attempting to produce helium, Congress has been fairly liberal.

Mr. LANHAM. In reply to that let me say that a great deal of it has been in experimentation and then to build the plant. Then for the operation of the plant for this fiscal year the Army appropriation bill made an appropriation of $100,000, which was later increased to $250,000 in conference after the Senate had passed it at $400,000. Consequently, it is not fair to charge up the capital expense to the production of helium, because for the little sum that we really have expended we have produced over 2,000,000 cubic feet of helium gas.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the mechanical engineers of the Government who have recently inspected the Fort Worth establishment recommend material physical changes before any further manufacture of helium?

Mr. LANHAM. Then, if that is the case, that is an additional reason why this apppropriation should be made and the plant put in condition.

Mr. ANTHONY. And that with the machinery now installed and with which they would have to work it is impossible to produce helium from a commercial standpoint, and that taking the case of the Roma, if we had filled the Roma with helium—and the Roma cost $400,000—if we had filled it with helium it would have cost $1,200,000 to fill it.

Mr. LANHAM. With all due deference to the gentleman, I have made some figures as to what it would have cost us. Applying the most excessive cost of helium during the operation of the plant, it would have cost $216,000 to fill the Roma with helium. But if the Roma had been filled with helium, to-day you would in all likelihood have the helium and the Roma and you would have the men who lost their lives in that great disaster. I have made an inquiry of the Veterans' Bureau as to how many of those men lost with the Roma had war-risk insurance. I have got the number, but I have not the amount. There were 30 men who went down with the Roma who had war-risk insurance. Assuming that they were carrying insurance at $10,000 each, there is $300,000, and if that $300,000 had been applied for this fiscal year in order that we might have a continuous operation of the plant we would have had enough helium on hand to fill six or eight Romas.

Mr. MANN. Have not we enough helium on hand to fill the Roma?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then if we had had a great deal more, they would not have filled it.

Mr. LANHAM. In so far as I am concerned, I am willing to see a law enacted that when you send men into the air in dirigibles they shall not go in anything but those filled with helium.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman provide by law that they should not send them up unless in a ship filled with helium?

Mr. LANHAM. Personally I am willing to have a law of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I realize the eloquence of the gentleman and his interest in this wonderful development, and I realize what a wonderful thing it would be if we had large quantities of helium that could be used, but the Army is now investigating the question of the destruction of the Roma, and the Committee on Appropriations, through its subcommittee on military affairs, is investigating the question of the development of helium and the advisability of appropriating money to carry on the work. It seems to me that we ought to move along in an orderly fashion. The War Department has not made any request for a dollar in connection with this activity. They know where they can make that request, and they know how to do it. If they have any justification for making it, why have they not made it? It will not do, it seems to me, for us to say that, notwithstanding the fact that the War Department itself has made no request, we rise in superior wisdom and knowledge and experience and must appropriate money based on that, regardless of whether the department charged with the responsibility wants it or not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In connection with the gentleman's statement that the War Department has made no request, I call his attention to the fact that in the hearings on the regular appropriation bill for this fiscal year, the one now pending, the War Department asked for $1,375,250 for this purpose, according to the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], on page 293 of those hearings. He there asked the question of the officer being interrogated—

> You are asking for $1,375,250 for helium extraction, conservation, and production. What success has been had—

And so forth.

The answer indicates that they have asked for that amount.

Mr. MADDEN. But that was last year.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is for this fiscal year?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. They asked for enough and far more than enough to have operated the plant for the entire year, and Congress saw fit to limit that amount.

Mr. MADDEN. They say now that the machinery of the plant is not of the kind or the type that will separate the helium from the other gases.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It may not be the best type, or it may be that their experiments have shown that there is a better type of machinery, or that improvements are needed to conduct experiments, but the fact remains that they have the machinery and that it has operated and that it has produced helium.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. I think my colleague from Texas has expressed accurately the view of the experts on this subject. This is a practical plant that is now established at Fort Worth—a production plant—but it is hoped through further experimentation gradually to reduce per cubic foot the cost of the extraction of helium from the natural gas. I do not think the contention has been seriously made by the department that this plant is not feasible, because they have extracted more than 2,000,000 cubic feet. Of course, being a new project, there were some mechanical defects, naturally, that could not well have been anticipated, and those troubles charged up to the operation of the plant necessarily have made the price per cubic foot somewhat higher than it would be under normal operation.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. How is it possible to make corrections and secure additional expenditures if there is no money to do it with?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LANHAM) there were—ayes 20, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise for the purpose of getting information. If I remember rightly Mariotte's law in chemistry or physics says that all gases at the same temperature and pressure have an equal number of molecules, and that the rate of expansion depends upon the increase of temperature and the decrease in the barometric pressure. In round numbers, all gas will expand 2 per cent for every 10° F. increase in temperature, barometric pressure remaining unchanged. It will also contract in the same proportion, so that it would be possible if we had a million cubic feet of gas at 60° F. and 30° of barometric pressure, if the temperature could be reduced to absolute zero, that we would not have a cubic inch of the million feet of gas. The gentleman has said that helium gas does not expand or contract as does hydrogen. If that is true, then the former accepted law regarding the contraction and expansion of gases has been proven to be untrue, and there is a new law which may be applied to scientific investigation which will enable the arts and sciences to develop along lines not heretofore accepted.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. My phraseology may not have been technically accurate, but the practical demonstration of the superiority of helium over hydrogen, according to all of the experts, was demonstrated in the flights of the C–7. Concerning the action of gases and the gentleman's statement that all gases act alike at equal temperature, which is not quite what he said, I would say that the very process of extraction of helium is by refrigeration and liquefaction through refrigeration of the other constituent elements of the gas, leaving the helium. For instance, you get liquid nitrogen, and at the same temperature all those gases do not behave alike. What the scientific terms are I am unable to say.

Mr. DUNBAR. I know, but when you obtain liquid nitrogen or liquid helium it is necessary, in order to obtain the gases, to apply heat, and if you have applied heat sufficiently, then there is no longer a liquid but a gas, so that the law of expansion and contraction of gases would apply to helium as a gas when in a gaseous state—and as it is when used in lighter-than-air craft—unless helium is different from any other gas, and if it is different, then a new law has been discovered in physics and chemistry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. They have not lost any helium out of the C–7 in any of its flights.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DUNBAR. I will state that it is possible that no amount of helium may have been lost out of any lighter-than-air craft which may be in existence, and that the reason that none has been lost is that in the inflation of the container they have been very careful not to put in an amount of gas which might be affected to an extent by expansion and which would leave no additional space available in the container due to temperature, or to the difference in barometer due to the height to which it might ascend; so that while the gentleman's statement may be true it is only true because extra precautions may have been taken to have sufficient extra space in container to take care of increased volume due to expansion, so as not to permit the escape of helium. Now, hydrogen being ordinarily cheaply produced is capable of being produced at very low cost—ordinary coal gas containing 50 per cent of hydrogen, while it is possible to produce hydrogen——

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNBAR. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I want to suggest in connection with what my colleague has said, that in the preparation of helium the helium gas is not liquefied. They liquefy the other gases, but helium remains a gas. The liquid is drawn off leaving the helium as a gas, so it does not behave exactly like the other gases which are liquefied.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DUNBAR. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Just to finish. The helium gas remains in a gaseous form. All the other gases are reduced to liquid form and drawn off, so that, in fact, the gentleman's theory is not wholly correct that they behave exactly alike and respond exactly alike to pressure, heat, and cold, because the other gases become, under pressure, liquids, so they can be drawn off, while helium gas, being a distinctive form, remains helium in a gaseous form. The other gases that have been broken down, the other gases extracted, are then restored to gaseous form by releasing the pressure and increasing the heat.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman labors under a misapprehension that all gases are reduced to liquid form at the same pressure and temperature.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is the theory on which the gentleman is basing his remarks.

Mr. DUNBAR. No, sir; that is not the basis upon which I base my remarks. Expansion and contraction of gas is due to the temperature and to pressure. Most gases have critical temperatures at which they become liquids, but the temperature varies with every gas.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice the bill carries an item of $1,600,000 for the transportation of ordnance stores. Can the gentleman give the value of the stores, and if all these establishments are to be permanently abandoned?

Mr. MADDEN. They are to be abandoned. The value of the stores amounts to several hundred million dollars and the cost of the equipment, and so forth, now amounts to about $50,000 a year, all of which will be saved by the expenditure of this money.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The action of the Executive in directing the issue, and the issuance of quartermaster stores and medical supplies out of the reserve supplies for the field service of the Army, and in directing payment for services for the repair of supplies, of a value not exceeding $82,858.15, for the relief of sufferers from storm and flood at Corpus Christi, Tex., and vicinity, in September, 1919, is approved; and credit for all such supplies so issued and funds so disbursed shall be allowed in the settlement of the accounts of the officers of the Army.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman what is the purpose of this sum here? Is it to reimburse——

Mr. MADDEN. It is to enable the disbursing officers to settle their accounts with the accounting officers. There is not any money involved in this appropriation.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will state to the gentleman that this says it is for relief of sufferers from storm and flood at Corpus Christi, Tex.

Mr. MADDEN. That is in 1919—way back. This is just to ratify the action of the President in authorizing the expenditure, so that the accounts may be settled with the accounting officers.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Where did these supplies go to—to individuals or to the Army down there?

Mr. MADDEN. It was an emergency, and they went to individuals, citizens of Texas, under authority of the President of the United States, who acted without any authority of law, and we are simply now ratifying what the President did, in order that the accounts may be adjusted.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 3, line 7, for the purpose of making a correction in the figures. Instead of "$2,484.68" the figures should be "$2,483.68." I ask permission to make that correction.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent, page 3, line 7, that the figures may read "$2,483.68." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. I would also like to go back to make another correction. In line 10, page 22, where it appears as "Public act No. 399," it should be "199."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that it is necessary now to designate the particular deficiency bill as we pass them by number so that we will not get them mixed up. This particular bill is designated as the second deficiency bill. May I ask the distinguished chairman of the committee how many more deficiency bills we may expect before we adjourn in June?

Mr. SNELL. When?

Mr. BLANTON. Before adjournment in June.

Mr. MADDEN. I presume before adjournment some items will have to be incorporated in a deficiency bill. Of course, I do not know, but it is usual to have a deficiency bill just before final adjournment.

Mr. BLANTON. The main point I desired to ask of the chairman of the committee was, what policy may the Members expect from his committee with regard to permitting bureau chiefs to make their plans and often go so far as to spend money that has not been appropriated, hoping that the Congress is going to come along in a deficiency bill and supply them with funds?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman heard what I said yesterday, did he not?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, yes.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I meant. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. There are a number of such items in this bill. I have not made any points of order against them, but there are several of them that are subject to points of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I think there were one or two things here subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. And there were one or two things here which the chairman well knows, because he is well informed, that cover matters where bureau chiefs exceeded their authority with respect to appropriations, and went beyond what the Congress had authorized in previous appropriation bills.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I may say to the gentleman that that probably would not be the case except now in the Navy for 1922 and in the Veterans' Bureau, of course. Nobody can tell what the amount of appropriations will be for the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not complaining about the appropriations for the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. Those are the two things.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to see every dollar spent that is necessary to rehabilitate our soldiers, but I refer to other bureaus where they are daily exceeding their authority with respect to appropriations.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think there are many such items in this bill. Most of these items, or a great many of them, are back to 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to call the gentleman's attention to several of them in the next appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman that if you take out the Colombia treaty item and the Veterans' Bureau, and the claims in judgment, that we can not control, and the settlements that are made back from 1916 to 1919, that we could not control, there is only $5,000,000 in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows just how carefully the various departments watch the law in order to go just as far as they can without coming within the law that permits a prosecution against them.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman very frankly that to the extent it is in my power to prevent that sort of practice in the future it will be prevented.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad to hear that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10663, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 58, noes 2.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VETO MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT—H. R. 77.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

I am returning herewith H. R. 77 without my approval.

Whatever is the purport of the act, there has developed such a conflict of opinion regarding it in the State of Idaho, where the lands covered by the act are located, that the Members of both Houses of Congress from that State have requested my disapproval, in order that the whole question may be taken up anew and fuller understanding secured.

Quite apart from the agreeableness of complying with this request, I am interested to have this very appropriate opportunity to suggest that it will be wise to have Congress give consideration to the adoption of the policy of definitely describing all such lands as are ordered transferred from the public domain for the benefit of private individuals or of the Forest Service, in exchange for lands within the forest reserves. If it is not possible to arrange for an accurate description by metes and bounds there may be acquired such descriptions as to locality as will leave no doubt in any mind relating to the purpose to be served.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 3, 1922.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill and the President's message be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon moves that the bill and the President's message be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SINNOTT. In explanation, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that after this bill was messaged from the Senate to the House with Senate amendments a controversy arose in Idaho regarding the bill. The House deferred for some time before asking for a conference. The conference was not asked for until we were assured that all the differences in Idaho regarding the measure had been composed. Then the bill went to conference, and certain features of the bill that were objected to were eliminated from the measure. But since then an additional controversy has arisen, and the author of the bill, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], together with the entire delegation from Idaho in the House and Senate, who supported the measure, requested the President to veto it, so that the bill might have further consideration. For this reason I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and I move the previous question on that motion.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a moment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Oregon withhold his motion?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. This is just one instance where not only the House but the Senate has passed legislation without information. I merely call attention to it, because we have had so many bills coming in here from various committees without information as to their effect that it is time we take note of it. This is one bill where action has been had, both in the House and in the Senate, without information.

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not concede the gentleman's position. I believe both the House and the Senate had full information on this measure. I move the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon moves the previous question on his motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the President's message and the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJUSTMENT OF ARMY, NAVY, AND MARINE CORPS PAY.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the joint committee appointed under the act of May 18, 1920, to report on Army, Navy, and Marine Corps pay, I request that the time for filing minority views be extended to next Monday. I ask unanimous consent that the minority be allowed time until next Monday in which to file their views.

The SPEAKER pro temopre. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time for filing the minority views on the question of the adjustment of Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and other service pay be extended until Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman if the views that have been filed as majority views represented the joint committee or were they merely the views of the House Members?

Mr. KRAUS. I think they represent the views of at least 7, and possibly 8, members of the committee of 10. I am confident all the minority views will be represented by Members of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The minority views will be represented by Members of the House?

Mr. KRAUS. Yes; the minority views will be represented by Members of the House—by from one to three Members.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The committee has not reported yet, as I understand, and I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent that my colleague and fellow member on the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT], may have leave to extend his remarks by printing an address which he delivered this morning before the National Merchant Marine Association in this city. I may say that I have read the address, and I think it will be of interest to Members of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] may extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered before the National Merchant Marine Association this morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the address referred to:

SPEECH OF FRANK D. SCOTT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM MICHIGAN, BEFORE THE NATIONAL MERCHANT MARINE ASSOCIATION, MARCH 3, 1922.

I have presumed to address you in the hope of emphasizing the inseparable relationship of business and legislation and to recall outstanding facts in the progress of our merchant marine which, when considered in chronological sequence, unmistakably point out their cause.

Laws touching any character of business should be predicated on their protection to the public and their assistance to the industry involved. If they are restrictive in purpose, they must not be destructive in effect. They should be helpful, not harmful. The pioneer efforts of the American merchant marine encountered the obstacles of other maritime nations. The necessity of transportation, the hazards, the inefficient and now obsolete utilities precluded legislative exactions. The restrictions were meager and the "rights of the road" were uniform. Requirements and increased production compelled increased and more effective transportation. This in turn impelled invention. National welfare produced national maritime identity and competition. Up until 1850 we had legislative encouragement and protection of our overseas trade. We were then carrying in American bottoms approximately 90 per cent of our exports and imports. The industry had developed such proportions as to attract attention. At this point in our history there was a radical change in our legislative attitude toward commerce on the high seas. I find indications of a meager effort on the part of the industry to direct an intelligent legislative course, and by almost utter default the policy of legislation changed from practical to theoretical. Other maritime nations have adhered to the policy which we abandoned. The only saving exception was in the instance of our coastwise trade. This was so close at hand, so capable of observation and appreciation, sheer force of merit persuaded its legislative protection. In the wake of the period we find a glowing contrast between our foreign and our coastwise commerce. In 1870 we were carrying less than 50 per cent of our foreign cargoes. In 1880 our ships were only carrying 17.4 per cent, and in 1914, with a foreign commerce of four billion and a half dollars annually, 8.9 per cent was transported under the American flag.

The following table indicates the efforts of maritime nations from 1870 to and including the year 1921. During that period all the countries, except the United States, have maintained a continuous program of assisting and protecting their foreign commerce. Except as to the coastwise trade, the United States in this period has given no assistance or protection to its foreign commerce. In considering the table it is important to remember that in 1870 three-fourths of our accredited tonnage was engaged in the coastwise trade. This increased gradually, and in 1914 six-sevenths of our tonnage was engaged in the coastwise trade. This deduction will indicate our comparative participation in world commerce. It is also important to note that from 1870 to 1914 our coastwise tonnage increased from 3,000,000 tons to 7,000,000 tons, and from 1914 to 1921 it has decreased from 7,000,000 tons to 6,000,000 tons.

Early in the nineteenth century we had a coastwise trade of approximately 70,000 tons. In 1870 the fleet had increased to 3,000,000 tons and in 1914 we had the magnificent coastwise fleet of nearly 7,000,000 tons. This was seven times larger than our transoceanic fleet. Is it possible that success and expansion brings with it jealous, prejudicial, and even destructive legislation? Do we purpose penalizing our entire citizenry for the industry and venture which has made us the premier Nation of the world? What other deductions can we make? When our ships were carrying 90 per cent of our foreign cargoes we revised our legislation with a reward of losing 80 per cent of the trade to which we were rightfully entitled. Is it possible that the American farmer does not realize that two bushels out of ten of everything he raises must be shipped abroad? Is it possible that the manufacturer does not appreciate that $4,000,000,000 worth of his manufactured product must be shipped abroad annually to permit the operation of his concern and insure the standard of living and wages which we enjoy? Our foreign-trade policy has been a tragedy. The future will be worse unless some heroic effort is made to avert an impending catastrophe. We have just survived our foreign-trade experience through sheer dominance of productive superiority, in spite of ignominious legislative disparity and rebuke. We are now at another milestone. We emerged from the war with a rehabilitated ocean tonnage as a governmental heritage. We have our coastwise ships, but a new legislative prescription has been offered to this trade, as one was offered to our foreign trade some 70 years ago. I refer to the so-called seamen's act, which became operative March 4, 1915, in which ocean traffic, ocean coastwise, and lake navigation are treated as a unit. Although a brief time has intervened between 1915 and the present, in view of the virtual suspension of this law during the war its ultimate effect is beyond conjecture. The results have been so patent that any uncertainty is confined to the extent of its damage. This is particularly true of Great Lakes navigation. Thriving towns and cities dot the islands of Lake Erie and the shores of Lake Huron. Prosperous, healthy industries employ thousands. The success of this section and its remarkable upbuilding has been made possible by the low expense of water transportation, permitting them to thus overcome the differential in distance from the market. Since the adoption of this law the fleets of passenger-freight steamers, which had for the last 50 years served this million population and made possible the upbuilding of the towns and the success of their industries, have now ceased operation entirely. Not one of these passenger-freight vessels visits the islands of Lake Erie or stops at any of the numerous ports on Lake Huron.

The resulting damage to this area has been very serious and will be accumulatively increasing unless this law is substantially modified. Great Lakes navigation can not exist, let alone thrive, unless the pronounced differences between Great Lakes and ocean operations are recognized in law as they are in fact. This distinct industry is entitled to recognition when it is considered that in 1914 nearly one-half of the tonnage operating under the American flag plied the waters of the Great Lakes. I have referred to the Great Lakes because it is, and has been, a very important factor in our system of transportation. This law is not as injurious to ocean transportation, but even as to this trade it should be modified, particularly in its regulation of the standard and personnel of the crew.

I consider the distress of our transoceanic trade comparable to that of the Great Lakes. We have not failed in legislation to recognize the needs of agriculture, and certainly the country must appreciate that the transportation of the product is as important as the stimulation of the product itself. Production means little without adequate and economic distribution.

It is universally admitted that our ocean transportation presents a very difficult problem. Its solution will require the active assistance of the honest business judgment of the country. Although our situation is not our fault, the responsibility is real and most important. At such a time soft words of flattery are a cowardly evasion and a disguised habituary. Men must speak what they think. I submit these few suggestions solely in the hope that they may possess some value in the solution of our problem.

The United States Shipping Board was created to meet a war emergency. It is an independent organization with all the overhead expenses incident to an independent concern. It was in reality a "first aid," and we have attempted to promote it to "family physician." Duplication in Government activities is our greatest evil. The United States Shipping Board and the Department of Commerce are covering each other's tracks in innumerable instances. I can not avoid the conclusion that the United States Shipping Board should be abolished and that all its functions should be placed in the Department of Commerce. I also urge the intelligent revision of the seamen's act so that it will apply to fact, not fiction. I also urge to your consideration the free use of the Government-owned terminals and port facilities to American ships with a program of extension as necessity may require and such other subventions as will permit fair competition. I also suggest the calling of an international convention for the purpose of correcting our commercial treaties to meet present needs and conditions, with a view of having national participation and national subventions in accord with the spirit and terms of the recent Disarmament Conference. I do not wish to be understood as recommending an attempted limitation of national commerce, but I do insist that governmental subventions should be so controlled and regulated as to avoid the possible maintenance of a well-armored floating arsenal in the guise of a national merchant marine. If we can discuss our war plans with our neighbors, we certainly can, with equal propriety and safety, discuss with them our peace plans. I offer these few suggestions for your consideration. Laws are enacted in consequence of necessity and demand. The necessity is apparent. The intelligence of the industry and the intelligence of the country should mobilize in making the demand.

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL AGRICULTURAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the National Agricultural Conference, which met in Washington from January 23 to 27, 1922, also the report of the committee on resolutions and the minority report of the committee on transportation, be printed as a public document.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the report of the National Agricultural Conference and the report of the committee on resolutions and the minority views of the committee on water transportation be printed as a public document. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that additional copies be printed at a cost not to exceed $500.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa further asks unanimous consent that additional copies of this document, not exceeding $500 in cost, may be printed. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will that be distributed through the folding room? It will not be unless some action is taken.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that the document and additional copies be distributed through the folding room.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the document referred to and the additional copies be distributed through the folding room. Is there objection to his request as modified?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how many copies will that deposit in the fold'ng room?

Mr. HAUGEN. About 5,000 or 6,000 copies. The additional cost will be about $92.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BULWINKLE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for seven days, on account of private business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address which I delivered in New Orleans on the third day of February on the transportation question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by him at New Orleans on the 3d day of February on the transportation question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the address referred to:

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted, I am printing an address delivered by me before the National Association of Sand and Gravel Producers at the sixth annual convention held at New Orleans:

THE TRANSPORTATION PROBLEM AND ITS RELATION TO THE SAND AND GRAVEL INDUSTRY.

The sand and gravel industry has the transportation problem, like the poor, with it always. After the beginning of the war all business had its feed of freight trouble, but with your industry it has been served as a regular diet, for breakfast, dinner, and supper, while those who have been at the front have had it served to them buffet style between midnight and bedtime.

When freight rates were low enough to furnish a good shipping area and business was good enough to furnish customers, priority orders in some other so-called essential industries had gobbled up all available cars. When by the grace of Providence and the Interstate Commerce Commission you had freight cars in sufficient numbers to take all the gravel out of a pit through to China, high freight rates had cut down your shipping area and a business depression had ruined your market. Like the man who already had rheumatism and St. Vitus dance, you had the satisfaction of knowing that no one could make more trouble for you.

It is my purpose to analyze the factors which enter into your freight problem and then to discuss where your energies should be centered in order to accomplish best results. The cost of production up to the point of shipment is relatively small. In these days of the expert cost accountant and the efficiency genius, each item of cost is carefully considered, but it takes no expert to see the item of freight frequently amounts to 75 per cent of your total delivered cost. Sand and gravel is a bulky product. The hauls are usually short. The ratio of freight charge to delivered cost determines the importance of freight schedules to any industry. All of these elements make the industry extremely sensitive to all changes in freight schedules.

It is not surprising that the shifting of the railroads from private operation to Government operation and then returning again to private operation, all in 26 months, with the consequent changes in policies, in freight rate tribunals, in methods of effecting changes in schedules, should work havoc with an industry so easily affected by rate changes.

My presence in Congress and my study and observation on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, having jurisdiction of the legislation respecting railroads, brings to my mind a few salient points which caused the trouble.

After the roads were taken over by the Government, Congress passed the Federal control act, which, among other things, gave to the President the power to initiate freight rates and took away from the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to suspend the taking effect of the rates during the pending of a hearing. Formerly interested parties could have a hearing and it might be developed that certain proposed rates would result in great hardship, which even the carriers proposing the schedule had not appreciated. The opportunity was also afforded to protect and defend against an unwarranted increase of rates. This gave stability to business involving transportation. Contracts could be entered into between consignor and consignee in advance of their consummation with assurance that they would not overnight be vitally affected by a change in the cost of transportation.

When the rate-making power was delegated to the Director General of Railroads, and the necessity was presented for an increase in railroad revenues, the Director General issued General Order No. 28. In some cases there was a percentage increase of a little over 25 per cent, and in other cases a flat increase of so much per ton, which reached as high as 200 per cent.

When application was made to secure a reduction, the shippers were informed that the shipment of construction materials should be discouraged, because road building was not one of the essential industries. Without passing upon the merit of that proposition, it ought to be quite clear that the power to initiate and adjust freight rates was never meant to be used for the purpose of regulating the business activities of the country.

The difficulties were not ended when Federal control ended. At the time of the return to private operation, notwithstanding the high advance in freight rates, the roads of the country were operating at a deficit. A six months' guaranty period was given, at the end of which the new schedule of freight rates was to go into operation. In the meantime the Railroad Labor Board had added some $600,000,000 to the labor bill, making a necessity for still higher freight rates, and Ex parte 74 was the result. The new schedule affected many industries, but the sand and gravel industry, being so sensitive to freight changes, was hit very hard. In many cases auto trucks were used in place of freight cars.

There is no other situation that entered into the freight troubles of the sand and gravel industry. A considerable part of the industry is dependent upon the construction of streets, public roads, and other public structures, the contracts for which are let by competitive bidding. The uncertainty of the freight rates frequently made it almost impossible to give estimates to contractors so that they could submit bids.

I have undertaken to enumerate the basic causes of your transportation difficulties. General Order 28 and Ex parte 74 were the Gold Dust Twins that did the work.

What is the best course to pursue to remedy the evil? Should there be a change in legislation affecting the roads? There have been three propositions urged: First, it is contended that the provision of the commerce act granting the right to the commission to use priority orders unjustly discriminates against the sand and gravel industry. I think these provisions should be carefully studied with the view of securing such an amendment from the Congress as will protect the industry in its right to an equitable distribution of cars. This matter is not pressing now, but since large bodies move slowly, the association should not wait until the pinch comes to make preparation.

For instance, while it may be all right to give coal a preferential right of shipment in emergencies, the preference ought always be measured by the emergency. For instance, under preferential orders in time of great scarcity of cars, coal was sent to factories manufacturing toys, while cars were refused to gravel plants when the gravel would have been used to complete the construction of a road which would have been of the greatest benefit to the public. I do not think that Congress will ever entirely eliminate priority orders in cases of emergency, but I feel that an effort with considerable hope of success could be made to hedge the priority provisions with such limitations as to make it accomplish only the purposes originally intended—that is, to meet the real emergency.

The second suggestion is to repeal the provision of the transportation act giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission supervisory power over freight rates within a State when it is found that they are unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential in view of the rate fixed on interstate commerce.

Upon that question I assume that there will be differences of opinion amongst the several members. There may be some instances in which greater benefits will accrue to certain producers by giving to the State commission exclusive power. Viewing the interests of the industry as a whole, I feel very sure that the law is more advantageous as it is now written.

Suppose there is a plant within shipping distance of Chicago on the Illinois side. Suppose there is one within a like shipping distance of Chicago on the Indiana side. The Interstate Commerce Commission has exclusive authority to fix the rate of the shipper from the plant in Indiana to Chicago, and the Illinois commission has the power to fix the rates from the plant in Illinois to Chicago.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission hasn't the power to prevent discrimination, the plant in Illinois may be able to secure from the State commission a rate which will absolutely destroy the power of the Indiana plant to compete. This sort of situation ought not to exist, and the remedy in the present law is adequate to secure immediate relief. While it might be to the advantage to the Illinois shipper, in the instance I have cited, if it were the question between an Illinois shipper whose products went into St. Louis, Mo., and a Missouri shipper whose products went to the same point, the reverse would be true.

The third suggestion is to repeal the rule of rate making in the transportation act. This ought not to be done. This was a rule which required the Interstate Commerce Commission to "establish rates so that the carriers as a whole (or as a whole in each of such rate groups or territories as the commission may from time to time designate) will under honest, efficient, and economical management and reasonable expenditures for maintenance of way, structures, and equipment earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal as nearly as may be to a fair return upon the aggregate value of the railway property of such carriers."

For a period ending March 1 next, the act specified that a fair return was 5½ per cent (and under certain conditions 5 per cent) on the property value. This is sometimes erroneously referred to as a guaranty. It was not a guaranty, was never meant as a guaranty, and can not possibly be construed as a guaranty. As a matter of fact, the roads earned less than 3 per cent on the value of their property as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the first year after the expiration of the six months' guaranty period, and are earning less than 3 per cent now, according to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The roads suffer the loss, however, and the Government has not agreed to and will not make up the difference, as would be the case if there was a guaranty.

There is an important provision coupled with this rule of rate making that where any road earns more than 6 per cent, one-half of the excess shall be held as excess return and be paid to the United States Government. Under this provision the Government will receive millions of dollars this year.

Thus the rule of rate making, improperly called a guaranty, is to serve the purpose of preventing the commission from establishing rates that would not be a fair return on the actual property value (which, by the way, is also protected by the Constitution), and at the same time of preventing the strong roads from getting unconscionable returns.

Whatever may be said of the wisdom of these provisions, it can unquestionably be said that neither the guaranty for the six months nor the rule of rate making is responsible for high freight rates. The obvious proof of this is that the six months' guaranty was not added to freight rates, but was paid out of the Treasury just like the deficit under Federal control, and rule of rate making did not yield either 5½ or 6 per cent, but less than 3 per cent on the property value of the roads. This rate of return would have been commanded by the provision of the Federal and State Constitutions against confiscation of private property.

There is just one thing that is mainly responsible for high freight rates, and that is the high operating expenses of the roads. If the rates were reduced so that the roads would not receive any net return on investment, the reduction would not be a substantial one and would give but little relief.

From September 1, 1920, to August 31, 1921, the year following the guaranty period, the total operating revenues of the class I railways, which represent 95 per cent of the revenues, was $6,045,338,100. Of that, there was a net railway operating income of $530,655,927. This is but 2.9 per cent on the property value of the railroads. The total operating expenses, including taxes, were $5,514,682,173. It is clear that relief is not in providing less than the 2.9 per cent return which is represented by the five hundred millions, but in attacking the operating expenses which represent five thousand five hundred millions of the amount paid in rates. The latter is about eleven times greater than the former.

This reduction in operating expenses is being made. Reductions in the cost of materials and equipment, reduction in labor costs have been of a substantial nature, and reduction in freight rates are following. The transportation act has weathered two threatened strikes. It has weathered almost two years of the most trying days of readjustment, and in spite of business depression it has so sustained railroad credit as to prevent the financial disaster which would have resulted if railroad failures and receiverships had occurred. The railroads, as an instrumentality for transportation, have been preserved and improved. The net earnings are moving upward as the operating costs are being lowered. This will be accelerated as the increase in business shall increase the freight and passenger revenues. Capital for additions and betterments can now be obtained. We thus have the safe and secure basis for reduction in freight rates in the full measure that is permitted under sound economic principles which will at the same time sustain an adequately equipped and properly operated transportation system under private ownership and operation.

Having advised you to seek legislative remedy on the question of car distribution and having undertaken to show that no legislative remedy can aid in reducing freight rates, I don't want you to think that I do not believe you can get the desired reduction in freight rates. I think the rates on sand and gravel are relatively higher than on other commodities. Your remedy, however, must not be in legislation, for under the present laws you have the right, first, to a reasonable rate; second, you have a right to a rate which is not discriminatory, as between different commodities, and you have the right to see that your 'competitors' rate does not so discriminate against you as to keep you out of a market to which all are entitled. The remedy is administrative, and will be affected just to the extent to which you apply your energies in securing the administrative relief. The existence of this association forms the basis for the most effective work to be done in that respect. You must bring up all your forces to make war on high freight rates. Make out your cases clearly; overwhelm the tribunal with proof. Let all the members of the association give closest cooperation; furnish your Washington office with the proper data, so that the facts may be presented to the commission.

Business is already on the mend. With the increase of business and the increase of revenue on the railroads, freight rates can come down. There is every reason for optimism in the sand and gravel industry for several years to come. I personally know there is contemplated appropriations of $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 annually to meet like appropriations from the States for the construction of highways alone in the next three years. While the high surtax, in which I do not believe, will retard business to a certain extent, your business is the one business which it will help. Municipal bonds and bonds of the States and State agencies for road and street building are free from Federal taxation, and a high surtax creates a ready market for such securities at a reasonable rate of interest. Looking the whole situation over from your viewpoint, it seems to me that there is every stimulus in the world for successful business.

Having recited to you some of your trials and tribulations of the past, in your look toward the future I want to offer you my hearty congratulations on the success which I am sure awaits you.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order just made, until Monday, March 6, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 4, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, February 23, 1922.)

The Senate met in secret executive session at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

After 1 hour and 45 minutes spent in secret executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that at the close of the routine morning business on Monday, if there shall be a morning hour, otherwise upon the assembling of the Senate, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to address it briefly on the subject of the four-power treaty.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, proposing to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator is present.

Mr. REED. I did not want to make the request I am about to put in his absence. I now observe that he is here. The Senate has given its permission that the vote on the confirmation of Maj. Peck shall be made public. That gives only a part of the record. The objections which have been urged to unanimous consent to making public the vote when Maj. Peck was rejected some weeks ago might be good objections if it were not for the fact that the final vote has been already made public. The final vote having been made public, I beg to suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the record is only partial, and I ask now if he will not give his consent——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make a point of order that what is now being discussed is executive business, and is out of order.

Mr. REED. Are we not in open executive session?

Mr. LODGE. We are in legislative session.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator moved to go into open executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is in legislative session.

Mr. REED. I could not hear what took place owing to the confusion in the Chamber. I thought it was an open executive session.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate is in legislative session, and I make a point of order that it is not proper to discuss in legislative session what was done in executive session.

Mr. REED. I can ask unanimous consent for a thing of that kind, if there be no objection. That is all I am asking.

Mr. NEW. I do not withdraw my objection.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. NEW. Now that we are in open legislative session, I wish to state how I voted on the Peck nomination if it will contribute anything to the peace of mind of the Senator from Missouri or anyone else. I voted for the confirmation of Maj. Peck. We are now in public session, and that can go to the world. I voted for it because I believed it to be right. I made the point of order for distinctly different reasons, and I do not withdraw my objection.

Mr. REED. I had no personal reference to the Senator, I want to say. I did not suppose he would object on personal grounds.

Mr. NEW. I did not, and I so stated.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is Senate resolution 213, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Committee on Rules.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, WIRELESS COMMUNICATIONS, 1923 (S. DOC. NO. 144).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of Commerce for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for the Bureau of Navigation, enforcement of the wireless communication laws, in amount $50,000, in addition to the $80,000 included in the Budget for 1923, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented resolutions adopted by the executive board of the Maine State Federation of Labor, indorsing the proposal of Henry Ford relative to the Muscle Shoals project, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAINE STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Lewiston, Me.

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the executive board of the Maine State Federation of Labor, February 27, 1922:

Whereas the great question before the American people to-day and the Congress of the United States is the proper utilization for the benefit of all the people of the great natural resources that have heretofore remained dormant at Muscle Shoals; and

Whereas Henry Ford, the mechanical wizard of the age, has made a proposal to the Government that meets with almost unanimous approval by the people of the entire Nation and apparently by a large number of Representatives in Congress and the Senate; and

Whereas Mr. Ford's offer for the operation of the Muscle Shoals properties was made in good faith to the proper person as spokesman for the Government, Secretary of War Weeks, and after due consideration by the Secretary was submitted to Congress for its approval or rejection and was apparently about to be ratified; and

Whereas selfish interests, such as the Fertilizer Trust, power monopolies, and others supported by the gigantic monied powers of Wall Street are opposed to the Government disposing of these resources in a way that would be of benefit to the people as a whole; and

Whereas a sequel to this great opposition is shown by the submission of a bid by the Alabama Power Co., a foreign corporation whose principal stockholders are not even citizens of the United States, and a corporation that has never been of any material benefit to any other than its foreign stockholders: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the executive board of the Maine State Federation of Labor, speaking in behalf of the citizens of our State, go on record as being unalterably opposed to the Government of the United States considering the bid of or entering into any agreement with said corporation, the Alabama Power Co.; and be it further

Resolved, That we believe that Muscle Shoals should be developed by Americans with American capital in the interests of the American people; and be it further

Resolved, That we, citizens of Maine, believing in the future of our Nation, heartily indorse the proposal of Henry Ford to take over and develop Muscle Shoals, and that we recommend to the Congressmen and Senators from Maine that they accept the bid of and enter into an agreement between Henry Ford and the Government of the United States for the operation and development of Muscle Shoals properties; and be it further

Resolved, That these resolutions be given the widest publicity by furnishing a copy to the press, to the Senators and Congressmen from Maine, and to the committee of Congress before whom the proposals are now pending.

EDWARD S. BOULOS, President.
H. B. BRAWN, Secretary.

Mr. FRANCE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Cumberland and Hagerstown, Md., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a resolution adopted by Greene County Local, No. 69, F. E. and C. U. of A., of Rector, Ark., protesting against the proposed transfer of the Bureau of Markets and Forest Service from the Department of Agriculture to other departments, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from the A. Karcher Candy Co., of Little Rock, Ark., remonstrating against any increase in the duty on dried-egg products under schedule 7, paragraph 13, of the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Frisco Division No. 228, Order of Railway Conductors of America, of Fort Smith, Ark., protesting against the passage of the so-called Volk sales tax bill and the connecting of such legislation to the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from the Batesville Chamber of Commerce, Ernest Neill, and W. M. Shelby, of Batesville, Ark., protesting against the placing of manganese on the free list and urging inclusion in the pending tariff bill of the manganese schedule as passed by the House, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LADD presented the petition of E. L. Stels and 62 other citizens of Hazen, N. Dak., and vicinity, praying for the passage of Senate bill 2604, the so-called Ladd honest money bill, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented the petitions of W. J. Bingham and three others, of Gardena; Louis Knutson and two others, of Stady; E. M. Braum and 78 others, of Wahpeton and vicinity; Hans A. Oyen and 60 others, of Grenora and vicinity; C. H. Skaggs and three others, of Mapes; and Peder M. Johnson and 52 others, of Park River, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation, so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Nekoma, N. Dak., and vicinity, praying that Europe be allowed 50 years to pay its $11,000,000,000 debt with 4 per cent interest, giving the United States her bonds therefor; that the United States Treasury issue greenbacks or notes to the full amount of such bonds, said greenbacks or notes to be redeemable at the end of 50 years; the Treasury to pay in full the so-called soldiers' bonus, loan the remainder at 5 per cent interest equally to each State, and to take each State's bonds to secure the Government, the States to loan their portions to the farmers at 6 per cent interest, and the farmers to give first mortgages of 75 per cent of the appraised value of their farms, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution adopted at the midwinter conference of Lend-a-Hand Clubs, at Boston, Mass., favoring reduced appropriations for the Army and Navy and reduction in the number of Army officers, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the executive committee of the Massachusetts branch, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, of Boston, Mass., praying that appropriations for the Army and Navy be reduced to the standard of 1914, which was ordered to lie on the table.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6507) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 529) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HARRISON:

A bill (S. 3230) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of Mary Ella Webster; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3231) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Commerce to collect and publish semiannually or oftener statistics concerning the production and consumption of cotton and its by-products; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 3232) to provide for the further investigation of the proposed waterway projects to connect the Ohio River with Lake Erie; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HARRELD:

A bill (S. 3233) granting an increase of pension to Catherine F. Edsall; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3234) granting a pension to Mrs. R. A. Robinson; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3235) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands;

A bill (S. 3236) to authorize and regulate the grazing of live stock on the public domain, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 3237) to repeal section 2453, and to amend sections 2450, 2451, and 2456, Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (S. 3238) to facilitate the use of and settlement upon the public lands of the United States through the improvement, construction, and maintenance of public roads, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 3239) to extend the provisions of section 2455, United States Revised Statutes, to the lands within the Fort Fetterman Abandoned Military Reservation in the State of Wyoming; and

A bill (S. 3240) to amend section 13, chapter 431, of an act approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 855), so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue trust and final patents on lands withdrawn or classified as power or reservoir sites, with a reservation of the right of the United States or its permittees to enter upon and use any part of such land for reservoir or power site purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. FRANCE:

A bill (S. 3241) for the relief of pensioners of the police and fire departments of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. EDGE (for Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN):

A bill (S. 3242) to provide for payment of the amount of a war risk insurance policy to a beneficiary designated by Capt. John W. Loveland, jr., deceased; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce on behalf of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], who is detained by illness, a joint resolution for reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FLETCHER (for Mr. DIAL):

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 170) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Darlington, S. C., tents, cots, etc., for the use of Confederate Veterans in their State convention, May 17 and 18, 1922 (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. EDGE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) granting consent of Congress and authority to the Port of New York Authority to execute the comprehensive plan approved by the States of New York and New Jersey, by chapter 43, Laws of New York, 1922, and chapter 9, laws of New Jersey, 1922; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. EDGE (for Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN):

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 2,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic and adjust the loss sustained thereby; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. LODGE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 173) authorizing the President to appoint a commission to represent the Government of the United States at the centennial celebration of the independence of Brazil, to be held at Rio de Janeiro in September next; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT TO SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to William Howard May $280.32 for rent of quarters while holding the office of marshal of the district of the Canal Zone; to refund to William K. Jackson $77.13 for rent of quarters while holding the office of district attorney of the Canal Zone, the refunds to be made out of the appropriation for maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal; and the Comptroller General of the United States to reopen and credit the accounts of John H. McLean, former paymaster of the Panama Canal, in $470.12 paid to Charles R. Williams as a refund of the amount collected from him for rent of quarters while holding the office of district attorney of the Canal Zone; in $403.33, paid to Miguel A. Otero as a refund to him of the amount collected for rent of quarters while holding the office of marshal of the Canal Zone; in $214.83, paid to Burt New as a refund of the amount collected from him for rent of quarters while a land commissioner in the Canal Zone; and in $114.68 paid to George A. Connolly as a refund of the amount collected from him for the rent of quarters while a land commissioner in the Canal Zone, intended to be proposed by him to the second deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN AUSTRIA.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a communication from Edward A. Filene, a well-known and public-spirited citizen of Boston, Mass., relative to the need of legislative relief for Austria's starving people, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance. Attached to the letter is a very excellent digest of conditions in Austria as observed during Mr. Filene's recent visit to that country.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WM. FILENE'S SONS CO.,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Boston, February 27, 1922.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Chamber, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: * * * I venture to address you in behalf of Austria and to urge a prompt and favorable report of the bill introduced by Senator LODGE, S. J. Res. 160.

Hundreds of thousands of the people of Austria are at the door of starvation and will perish of hunger and the diseases that accompany starvation unless early relief is obtained. The American Congress and people intended, when two years ago they gave Austria the $24,000,000 credit with the United States Grain Corporation, actually to save her people and never intended that their loan should result in tying her hands and rendering her helpless, with the result that the starvation of her people would only be delayed.

The situation now is vastly worse than when the loan was made. I visited Austria last summer and early autumn and have been in close touch with the situation there since that time. My last report was from the American Friends service committee and was received only a few days ago. The months between now and the coming harvest will be the worst that Austria has experienced.

The door to relief should be opened at once by release of the assets pledged to payment of this and like loans from other nations. I am credibly informed that all the other creditor nations, either by formal action or through diplomatic channels, have assured Austria that they would take the action proposed by Senator LODGE'S resolution, but whether or not this information is correct as regards all of them, we are not justified in delaying favorable action until all others have relinquished their claims. The bill provides, as you will no doubt notice, that the release of the assets shall take effect only when all the others have also waived their liens.

As an act of charity and mercy, I urge that this bill be reported and passed at once. I am in touch with the sentiment on this subject throughout the country, and am convinced that the people of all sections will support you in the proposed action. * * *

Very sincerely, yours,

EDWARD A. FILENE.

P. S.: I inclose with this letter a brief statement covering the whole situation, which you may care to refer to.

LEGISLATIVE RELIEF FOR AUSTRIA'S STARVING PEOPLE.

THE HISTORY OF RELIEF PLANS.

As long ago as March 17 last the supreme council of the Allies, meeting at London, after conference with an official commission from Austria in which a plan for the financial and material rehabilitation of Austria was under discussion, asked the financial committee of the League of Nations "to meet within the following fortnight, examine the financial situation of Austria, and seek means of remedying it."

At the same time that the supreme council made this request the Governments represented in the meeting, namely, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, to all of which Austria was owing money secured by a lien on the Austrian State assets, agreed "to release for a period of years, to be determined later, their liens under the treaty of St. Germain in respect of claims against the Austrian Government for the cost of armies of occupation, for relief credit bonds, and reparations, provided other interested Governments will agree to similar postponement."

The committee of the League of Nations which was requested to make the inquiry and report was a most competent one. As requested by the supreme council it met in Paris from March 28 to 31, where, in conference with the official commission from Austria that had previously conferred with the supreme council, it considered the whole situation.

It then sent a delegation to Vienna, which from April 15 to May 12 studied the situation on the ground, conferred with officials and leading financial men of Austria, with representatives of all the political parties in Austria, and formulated its report.

On May 31 the financial committee, having considered the report of their delegation to Austria, rendered a report to the supreme council of the Allies which closed with the following words: "The committee * * * have approved a program of financial action competent, in their opinion, to restore the Austrian economy. Temporary advances to initiate this program are assured. It rests with the Governments concerned to allow the work to be undertaken on the conditions indicated in the committee's note of April 4."

The condition thus referred to in the committee's note of April 4 that would "allow the work to be undertaken" was that other creditor Governments of Austria which had a lien on Austrian assets should agree to take action regarding the debts due them similar to action already taken by the powers represented in the London meeting of the supreme council of the Allies.

The program of financial action which, in the opinion of the financial committee, was "competent to restore the Austrian economy" included (a) negotiation of a foreign loan secured by Ter Meulen bonds resting on the following assets of the Austrian Government: Customs receipts, revenues from the State tobacco monopoly and from forests and mortgages on all real estate of the country; (b) a reform of the currency to be effected by a strong and independent bank of issue; (c) the balancing of the budget; (d) the flotation of a substantial internal loan which should make it unnecessary to continue the issuance of paper money.

To this program the Austrian Government and the responsible leaders of all the parties of Austria had pledged themselves, as had also the bankers and leaders of finance and industry.

As the temporary advances necessary to put the plan into execution had been agreed upon, and as Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan had agreed to release their claim on the State assets of Austria in favor of the new foreign loan, it remained only for the other creditor nations to take like action.

Of these remaining creditor nations the United States was the chief creditor and most influential. It was generally understood that if we acted, the other and smaller nations would also act; but since we failed to take action, other and minor creditors waited for us, and the matter was delayed from month to month, during which time Austria drifted nearer and nearer to the financial collapse which finally has come.

STARVATION IN AUSTRIA REQUIRES IMMEDIATE RELIEF.

This delay creates a most dangerous situation for Austria. It requires only legislation by the United States to save the nation from the great dangers arising from unbearable conditions, and great masses of her people from starvation and death.

Usually the foremost in all philanthropic work, the United States in this case is holding up the procession led by the other powers. If countries such as Belgium and France, themselves cruelly ravished by war, can favor this suspension of the Austrian debt, surely we can do so also, especially as Austria is utterly incapable of paying this debt or arrears of interest at present.

FEDERAL COUNCIL ASKS SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

On December 15 the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in view of the increasingly critical situation of the Austrian population, passed a formal resolution petitioning Congress to take separate action on Austria's debt to the United States. The council specifically petitioned that special and immediate legislation be enacted to the end that payment of Austria's debt of $24,000,000 be suspended for at least 20 years. The nations referred to above have already agreed to this arrangement.

The Federal council has sent this petition to 150,000 churches in America, suggesting that the congregations take like action. Knowing first-hand, as I do, the severe straits in which Austria finds herself, I am supplementing the campaign of the Federal council in behalf of help to Austria by sending the facts, and a covering petition to Congress, to influential leaders and organizations in every State of the Union.

AMERICAN INACTION PREVENTS RELIEF.

Our loan to Austria, enabling her to purchase from us $24,000,000 worth of flour, was authorized under special act of Congress, March, 1920. Payment for these foodstuffs, according to the act, must be made within five years.

The failure of Congress to authorize deferment of this debt, a debt which Austria is absolutely incapable of paying at the present time, is holding up a new international loan which would place Austria in a position of physical and economic rebirth.

Yet this debt of $24,000,000, contracted solely for the purchase of foodstuffs to relieve a starving people, is lumped in with a debt of over $11,000,000,000 owed to the United States by all the European debtor countries for purchases of war materials as well as of foodstuffs.

AUSTRIA IS STARVING.

Meanwhile Austria starves. In the midst of a bitter winter her people are suffering from disease, starvation, and death. The situation is extremely critical. The crown, which before the war was worth 20 cents, is now quoted in Vienna at one one-hundredth of a cent. That is, where before the war 5 crowns would buy a dollar, 10,000 are at this date needed to buy a dollar or its equivalent in merchandise. Even in its own country the purchasing value of the crown has fallen so low that a 10-cent loaf of bread costs, according to the normal value of the crown, over $200.

As an American keenly interested in the rehabilitation of a world torn now by peace as it was formerly by war, and after personal study of conditions in Austria, I am taking the liberty to write you this digest of Austria's situation and to suggest a remedy in the form of special action by Congress. The inclosed resolution is the one approved by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and by other national organizations.

WHAT YOU CAN DO ABOUT IT.

If you will get your organization to adopt and send this resolution to the President and to your Senators and Representatives in Congress, will induce individuals to write letters to them, and will give the matter as much publicity in the press as possible, you will have done your part toward keeping practically the whole population of Austria from becoming the victims of a situation for the relief of which the United States seems to have the chief responsibility.

May I request that you let me know what action you and others take on this grave and pressing matter? I stand ready to furnish as many copies of the resolution as you believe can be used to advantage.

EDWARD A. FILENE.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, proposing to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts provides that one member of committees of conference shall come from the committee which, under the rules of the Senate, would have jurisdiction of the particular bill in conference. Part of the amendment I have offered provides that two members from any one of these various committees shall go on the conference committee.

The unfairness of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts lies in the fact that one member from the Committee on Agriculture, we will say, or the Committee on Military Affairs, would go on any conference committee. Of course, that one member would be the chairman of the committee, and to-day the chairmen of the committees are Republicans. Consequently, we would have no minority representation in conference. All that is necessary to be done is to state the proposition to show the unfairness of it.

Under the peculiar parliamentary situation I can not move to amend this amendment, because it is an amendment to the committee amendment; but if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is voted down, I shall then offer an amendment providing that at least two members from any one of these various legislative committees shall be on any conference committee. That is fair, it is just, and it is the right thing to do. The minority should be represented the same as the majority, and the third member of the conference committee, if there are no more than three members, of course, will be a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

I therefore sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will be defeated, and in this connection I want to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. This being an amendment to the committee amendment, if it should be adopted it would provide that one member of each conference committee on appropriation bills shall be a member of one of the various legislative committees. Would that preclude the consideration afterwards by the Senate of an amendment which would provide that two members of such conference committees shall be members of one of the legislative committees?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is not familiar with the rule on that question, but he is free to give his impression to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. May we have order, because this is very material.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is free to give his first impression to the Senator from Mississippi, that being an amendment in the third degree, the Senate would be precluded from making such a change as is suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. We are considering a change in the rules which affects every section and every industry of the country, and at this moment there are not over eight Senators on the other side of the aisle. The Chair has just stated that if the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts should be agreed to, we would be precluded from offering another amendment providing that two members of any one of these various committees should go on a conference committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair would qualify his ruling to this extent, that of course the amendment would be subject to a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HARRISON. It would be open to reconsideration; that is to say, if it should prevail, then there might be a motion to reconsider it, naturally.

Now is the time to present the finished product, and yet, under the statement of the Chair, if this amendment is adopted, only one member of a conference committee will come from the membership of any of the legislative committees having jurisdiction of the particular bill which may be in conference.

Every Senator knows that it is in conference where these questions are decided, where amendments which have been agreed to in the Senate are excluded, where the power is wielded by three men to undo what 96 men have done in the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. If it is fair for one member of a committee, representing the majority, to go on a conference committee, without any representation of the minority, if that is to be the voice of the Senate, well and good.

I am calling the attention of the Senate to the consequences of this vote, and yet, as I said, there are not eight Senators on the other side of the aisle at this time. No Republican representation is on the floor at this time save the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. All the other States are not represented now and have not heard what the ruling of the Chair will be and the consequences of this vote.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there are two Republican Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber?

Mr. HARRISON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I want to congratulate the new Senator from Iowa [Mr. RAWSON], who has been in his seat from the beginning to the close of each session of the Senate ever since he took his oath here, and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM], who are now present. Of course, the Democratic side is here. We are always here.

Mr. WARREN and Mr. SMOOT. Name them!

Mr. WILLIS. Name the Democrats present.

Mr. HARRISON. I want the great section of the West to know that in such a great crisis as this the representation is not present on the Republican side.

Mr. President, I have said with reference to the pending amendment all that I desire to say.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to present a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know if the proposed amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts would be subject to an amendment by changing the word "one" to the word "two"; in other words, whether it would be in order to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will state to the Senator from Florida, in answer to his parliamentary inquiry, that the present occupant of the chair would not undertake to give a definite ruling upon any question of that character, but, as the Chair said in response to the question of the Senator from Mississippi, it is the impression of the Chair that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, once being adopted, the opportunity not being availed of to perfect the amendment, it is not thereafter open to amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood that; but my inquiry is whether we will have the opportunity to perfect the amendment, if we may term it that, by proposing that the language "one member" in line 9 of the proposed Lodge amendment and in each one of those clauses be changed to "two members"? I understand the Senator from Mississippi insists that there ought to be two members from the committees outside of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRISON. There should be at least two, and really there ought to be three. All we have ought to come from there.

Mr. FLETCHER. What I am inquiring about is whether it would be in order for the Senator from Mississippi or any other Senator to propose an amendment to the Lodge amendment by way of perfecting it, if you please, so as to change the words "one member" to "two members"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does not the Senator from Florida think that is an amendment in the third degree?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the question in my mind. I was not sure whether the rule would permit us to perfect the Lodge amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it would not be in order, but the Chair may state that the matter is in full control of the Senate, and that the Senate, if it desires, may defeat the amendment, and the Senator from Mississippi or the Senator from Florida may then offer such other amendment as he may choose. It is wholly within the control of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Chair is exactly right. I only propounded the parliamentary inquiry so that Senators would know what they are voting on. If it were within my power now to offer an amendment and have it adopted, I would do so, but, being an amendment in the third degree, it is not in order.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to have the attention of the Senator who has the matter in charge. I am addressing my query to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I would like to know what objection there would be to having it stated, now that we are changing the rule, that at least two members, or definitely two members, although I prefer the term "at least two members," from the committee that has had that particular matter in charge shall be appointed. What objection would there be to naming two instead of naming one, as the Senator from Massachusetts has already proposed?

Mr. WARREN. I would like the attention of the Senator who has raised the question. There is no rule of the Senate that requires the appointment of a Democrat or a Republican on any conference committee. The rule requires only that conferees shall be appointed. It has been the practice, ever since the United States has had a government, so far as I know, to appoint from the minority and the majority in proportion equal to party strength, as nearly as may be.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely unnecessary, although I have no objection to it. But if we make it two instead of one we are going to be in this position: We shall have in some cases two different committees that will be drawn from at once and we will thus have three committees represented and operating, and two of each is too many. The other committees which are interested will each have two representatives, if we adopt the suggestion that there shall be two appointed from each of such committees, and there will then be four outside conferees, rather too many to start with if we expect to have any conferees at all from the Appropriations Committee itself. There is no objection to having one member from the other committees. There will always be two when it can be arranged that way, because the precedents of the Senate call for it, but I think the Senator is perfectly well aware that there has seldom been any complaint from any committee about the division of representation made by the Committee on Committees, which has the naming of the members of the various committees. The Committee on Finance, of course, in tax matters proceeds differently. As I said, the practice has been to put the party in the majority in charge first and call the minority in later.

There is another thing to be considered. There are times, for instance, when this situation might arise: It is desirable to have three on the conference committee, and there might be an absence or illness that would prevent two being taken from the committee out of the three. Then we would have to provide otherwise. A Senator might say, "I am going away, but I wish you would put in my place on the committee so-and-so, who agrees with me."

But to come back to the original proposition, I think it is unnecessary to undertake to discuss further the contention of those who perhaps have not had so much practice in the matter of appropriations that they are going to have some outrage committed upon them, because, as I said, without any question whatever and without any reason why whatever, except that fairness always exists between the two parties here in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi will allow me——

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. I do not see the force of the argument of the Senator from Wyoming in case one would be sick, for the reason that the proposition, as I understand it, is that two from the committee that heretofore has had charge of the matter—to illustrate, two from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry—are to be appointed. I do not understand that even the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts meant that we had to take one of those who had conferred with the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WARREN. If they are to do their duty and have the knowldege to execute that duty, the conferees must naturally have served on the subcommittee. It is only in cases of absence or illness that any man is placed upon a conference committee who has not participated in the consideration and construction of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. I know that would be natural in conference, but in a matter relating to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry or to the Committee on Military Affairs there will be members who are as thoroughly conversant with the matter and as competent to serve on a conference committee as those who might accidentally be delegated to serve with the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose we had referred to this committee the Agricultural appropriation bill, and the rule required two conferees to be appointed from that committee, and the Committee on Military Affairs was also interested before the committee in the same bill, we would have to have two members appointed from each of those committees and therefore we would have four, two from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and two from the Committee on Military Affairs. What would be the result?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, not on the same bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; on the same bill. I can refer to a bill now pending, the Interior Department appropriation bill now before the Senate. That is an argument on the very question that we have before us now. The pension appropriations are in that bill. The appropriations for the Indian Bureau are in that bill. Heretofore they have been referred to different committees, to the Committee on Indian Affairs and to the Committee on Pensions. If the rule requires that two be appointed from the Committee on Indian Affairs and two from the Committee on Pensions, there we would have four; we would have one more than we have ever appointed heretofore. There is the trouble.

If the chairman of a committee would refuse to give representation on the Appropriations Committee in this matter, of course he would be denounced in the Senate and denounced everywhere. Really it ought to be left to the chairman of the committee to choose the conferees, because the chairman always gives the minority representation; but if we adopt the hidebound rule that two shall be appointed from each committee, then we would have four conferees instead of three, as has usually been the case.

Mr. SMITH. Where certain appropriation bills are involved, I see the difficulty.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Under this rule the river and harbor appropriation items are in the Army appropriation bill, which goes to the Committee on Military Affairs; yet if the Senator's proposal were agreed to we would have to have three members from the Committee on Military Affairs and three members from the Committee on Commerce, which has charge of the river and harbor appropriations. If we make this two conferees instead of one from each we would have two members from the Committee on Commerce and two from the Committee on Military Affairs to start with before anybody was put on from the Committee on Appropriations. A conference committee of six is too large for that purpose. The House will not act in a conference that would be like a town meeting.

Mr. SMITH. I understand. My misapprehension of the matter was that we had merged into one bill certain bills that heretofore had gone to separate committees. That would not apply, of course, to the Agricultural appropriation bill unless we should merge it in with the Army appropriation bill as well, which now goes to the Committee on Military Affairs. But it seems to me in that event the rule might be so modified as to provide that where the bill under consideration has not been merged into another, two may be appointed.

However, I recognize the point the Senator from North Carolina has made. When I rose I had not taken that point into consideration. As the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said, these appointees would be accommodated to the condition as it arose. I offer no further objection to the proposed amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not going to delay the Senate further. I think the very few Senators who are on the floor realize evidently what they are going to vote on. I would like to have the yeas and nays on it, however. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am not going to make the point of no quorum at this time, though I think there ought to have been more Senators here. In justice to the members of the committee who have framed the legislation I think the matter ought to be understood before we take the vote. I frankly admit that I did not understand until the Senator from North Carolina made the point or called my attention to the fact that under the proposed new rule certain bills that heretofore have gone to different committees are now merged into one and go to the Committee on Appropriations as one bill. Therefore, if we provide for more than one conferee on the matter of particular bills that have heretofore gone to different committees, I can see how it would be almost impossible to accommodate the conferees.

However, if this is voted down, then I think perhaps the matter might be adjusted by providing that where there has not been a merger of bills, in that event two from the committee that had the particular bill in charge should be appointed. I think the Senator from North Carolina agrees with me that that might be done, and in case the pending amendment to the committee amendment is voted down, I believe an amendment of that kind should be offered and voted upon.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am willing to leave it to the chairman of the committee, as we have always left it. The Senator from South Carolina suggests a proposition that might solve the difficulty; but I shall vote against any requirement that the chairman shall appoint one, two, three, or four or any other particular number. I am willing to leave it where it has always been, with the chairman of the committee, knowing that he will give proper representation on the committee. Therefore I shall vote against the pending amendment and any other amendment that proposes to fix the number of conferees. I favor leaving it to the chairman, knowing that he will do his duty, as any Senator will do his duty, on all occasions and give fair representation to the minority as well as the majority. Let us leave it where it has been for the last 100 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the Committee on Rules.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am informed that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a general pair, if present, would vote as I intend to vote upon this question. Therefore, it is unnecessary for me to make a transfer of my pair, and I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KELLOGG] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. In his unavoidable absense, I am not entitled to vote. If I were free to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ERNST. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. COLT. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the affirmative). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent, and I have agreed to take care of him by pairing with him. I understand that I may transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I do so, and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—46.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	McNary	Stanfield

So Mr. LODGE's amendment to the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to, as follows:

On page 2, line 16, after the word "Appropriations," insert the following: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Agriculture shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Agricultural appropriation bill";

On page 2, line 22, after "Appropriations," insert the following: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Post Office appropriation bill";

On page 3, line 3, after the word "Appropriations," insert the following: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Military Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of War";

On page 3, line 9, after the word "Appropriations," insert: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of the Navy";

On page 3, line 16, after the words "Department of War," insert: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Commerce shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon items pertaining to rivers and harbors contained in the bill making appropriations for the Department of War"; and

On page 3, line 24, after the words "Departments of State and Justice," insert: ", and at least one member of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House when the items pertaining to the diplomatic and consular service are being considered in the bill making appropriations for the Department of State and Justice."

So as to make the amendment of the committee read:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill, and if the point is sustained, the bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations: Provided, however, That the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Agriculture shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Agricultural appropriation bill; that the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Post Office appropriation bill; that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Department of War is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Military Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of War; that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Department of the Navy is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of the Navy; that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the items pertaining to rivers and harbors are being considered by the Committee on Appropriations in the bill making appropriations for the Department of War, and at least one member of the Committee on Commerce shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon items pertaining to rivers and harbors contained in the bill making appropriations for the Department of War; and that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the items pertaining to the Diplomatic and Consular Service are being considered by the Committee on Appropriations in the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and at least one member of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House when the items pertaining to the Diplomatic and Consular Service are being considered in the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the ruling of the Chair in answer to a parliamentary inquiry a few moments ago to be that if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee were adopted I could not offer an amendment providing that two members of the respective committees which heretofore have handled various appropriation bills shall be members of the conference committee. I now offer an amendment to strike out the words "one member" where they appear in the amendment to the amendment just adopted and to insert the words "two members," so that in the conference committees two members of the respective appropriating committees shall be represented upon the conference when the appropriation bill in which they are interested is being considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think that amendment is entirely out of order. If it is in order, I say in all seriousness that I hope it will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming make a point of order against the amendment?

Mr. WARREN. There would arise under it conditions in connection with the arrangement of conference committees with which it would be almost impossible to comply, which I have explained to the Senator from Mississippi and to other Senators.

I therefore make the point of order against the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi and ask that the Chair rule on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understood the Chair, in answer to the parliamentary inquiry, to say that as in Committee of the Whole the amendment would be one in the third degree and consequently the point of order could be raised against it and would be sustained. I inquire, What is the parliamentary status of the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the Chair is advised that the parliamentary status of the resolution is that it is in the Senate. Being purely a Senate resolution, it is not considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not think that the resolution would be considered as in Committee of the Whole, but when the Chair stated that my amendment would not be in order, thereby implying, of course, that when the resolution passed into the Senate an amendment providing for the appointment of two conferees from other committees instead of one might be offered, I imagine there were quite a number of Senators who voted for the amendment providing for one conferee on the supposition that one would be better than none at all if, under the parliamentary status, we could not get two. So I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be considered in order.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator has recourse, without doubt, at the proper time in the consideration of the measure; but this is not the proper time, and I shall have to object.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator what would be the proper time for me to offer an amendment that would make it two instead of one? If the Senator will tell me, I shall not insist on the amendment at this time.

Mr. WARREN. I do not have to tell the Senator. He knows the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the ruling of the Chair that we are now in the Senate and not in Committee of the Whole, and since this amendment has been adopted, I know of no rule by which I am now permitted to offer another amendment that will provide for the appointment of two members on the conference committee. If the Senator will suggest it, I shall be delighted.

Mr. WARREN. I sincerely object to occupying the time of the Senator. I would not think of doing it, because he is entitled to the time, and has been waiting some days now, nearly a week.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I have not said anything on this rule.

Mr. WARREN. Furthermore, the Senator is a master of the rules himself.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I know nothing about the rules. I wish I did, so that I could secure a vote by the Senate on the question of having two conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not wish the Senator from Mississippi to misunderstand the position of the Chair. The Chair did not intend to convey to the Senator from Mississippi the belief of the Chair that what he desired to be accomplished could not be accomplished if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] were adopted. What the Chair did intend to say was that the Senator's amendment would not be in order to accomplish what he desired.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. So now we are in the position that we are precluded, except by a motion to recommit this resolution, from offering an amendment making it two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator make a request?

Mr. HARRISON. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I believe there are one or two amendments on the table offered by certain Senators.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to present an amendment when this other matter gets out of the way; but I had understood that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] was very much interested in offering an amendment to the committee amendment so that one of the conferees shall come from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there is no amendment pending. Unless some amendment is proposed, the question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I spoke to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] just a moment ago, and he said he understood that even if he should not be on the floor his amendment would be proposed. I supposed he had that understanding with the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. I will say that at the proper time the amendment of the Senator from Delaware should be offered. I have been waiting for him to come into the Chamber, because, as he has drawn the amendment, it is like the amendment in regard to rivers and harbors and the diplomatic and consular part of the resolution rather than like the Army and Navy and agricultural part of it. Perhaps the Senator does not understand that, and I had waited for him to give it some attention. It is a matter that the Senate, of course, ought to pass upon. However, it can be added to the resolution as a separate section. There is no reason why we should not vote on the main question.

Mr. BALL entered the Chamber.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, while the Senator from Delaware is preparing to offer his amendment I want to suggest the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I do not think the chairman of the committee will have any objection to it.

On page 2, line 5, after the word "containing," insert the words "amendments proposing," and also in line 6 the same words. I will send up the printed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington, on behalf of the Senator from Nebraska, proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 5, after the word "containing," it is proposed to insert the words "amendments proposing"; and at the end of line 6, on the same page, after the word "containing," it is proposed to insert the words "amendments proposing"; so that, if amended, those lines will read:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing amendments proposing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing amendments proposing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer that amendment in behalf of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as I understand, the purpose of that is to make the bill subject to a point of order where the amendment is proposed in the Senate; but if the bill comes over from the House containing new legislation, the point of order would not lie against it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is substantially the purpose of this amendment, so that the Committee on Appropriations will not be prohibited from reporting a bill that has House provisions containing legislation. That is the purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, on behalf of the Senator from Nebraska, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I see the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] now in the Chamber. He had an amendment with regard to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I offer an amendment, to be inserted at the proper place, and will ask the Secretary to alter it accordingly, so that on matters that come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Indian Affairs that committee shall also have one representative in the conference. Let the amendment read as it is written in this proposed rule.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the Indian Affairs Committee is not fighting this rule, and is not asking for the provision that the Senator proposes. The bill that contains the appropriations for Indian affairs has passed the Senate and is now in conference. It is true that several members of the Indian Affairs Committee are on the general Appropriations Committee, but they are not asking for representation on this committee. They are perfectly satisfied with what has been done, as the Senator from Mississippi will be when this rule is adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to express myself on this rule in a few moments, and I shall elaborate in detail how it will affect every interest and every section of this country, and I shall show how a few Members of this body are trying to grab the whole power of making all appropriations by the United States Senate. The Indian Affairs Committee is an important committee. It deals with the appropriations for the Indian tribes throughout this country. It has a right to have one representative in the conferences on appropriation bills for these tribes, the same as the other committees to which representation has been given. So I have offered the amendment; and if the Senator from Delaware does not offer his amendment with regard to the District of Columbia Committee I shall offer one, and I shall also offer one touching irrigation for the great West, if no Senator from that section offers such an amendment, and I shall try to secure a record vote on the proposition.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. BALL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, line 9, after the semicolon, it is proposed to insert the following words:

That the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia and two other members of said committee to be selected by the chairman of said committee shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the amendment as written corresponds, I take it, to the amendments referring to other committees. The Committee on the District of Columbia differs from all other committees of Congress. In reality, the Senate and the House take up District matters as city councilmen, I might say; and the Committee on the District of Columbia has to sit a great deal of its time for the consideration of small matters of city management. Therefore I have no objection to the amendment, and I hope it may be agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator can not offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make the point of order?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the amendment just offered and agreed to, in the following words:

And that two members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, on any conference with the House on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, shall be appointed to serve at said conference.

Mr. WARREN. I raise a point of order against that, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. WARREN. It is not necessary for me to state the point of order. If the point of order should be properly overruled, I am ready to have it overruled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair thinks that the amendment now offered by the Senator from Mississippi is an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. I am perfectly ready to let it go to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment of the committee.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment just agreed to, it is proposed to insert the following words:

And that two members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, on any conference with the House on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, shall be appointed to serve at said conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, no one has as yet answered to the roll call. Is the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to require two members from the District of Columbia Committee to be placed on the conference committee on District of Columbia appropriation bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the roll.

The call of the roll was resumed.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ERNST. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the negative). I understand that my pair, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], would vote as I have voted on this amendment. I allow my vote to stand without a transfer.

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I assume he would vote as I have voted, and therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). Making the same announcement as before, I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. COLT. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 49, as follows:

So Mr. HARRISON'S amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the intention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] and the intention of the chairman of the committee was that the Committee on the District of Columbia should be on an exact basis with the other full committees. So I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], applying to the various other committees, have written into it the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end a comma and the following words:

And at least one member of the Committee on the District of Columbia shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee, and also of other Senators, to an amendment I want to suggest to the committee amendment. I want to make it possible for the various committees which, under this amendment, are to be entitled to have three members on the Appropriations Committee, to select those members, instead of giving that right and authority to the chairman, and instead of necessarily naming the chairman. I suppose, as a matter of practice, the committee would select the chairman, and probably one ranking member from each side, and they would make the three, very likely, so that in most instances I do not suppose this amendment would change the practical operation of it. But it seems to me we should not give to one person the absolute power to appoint three members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Then, we must remember that often it will happen that the chairman, who is automatically named as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, is sometimes a member of the Appropriations Committee anyway. I do not know of any instance now, but in the last Congress that was true of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. I have not looked it up, and it may be true of several other committees now; but it is likely to occur at any time. If that should be true, then the spirit of the law could not be carried out unless this amendment were amended.

Therefore I offer this amendment. I will have to make one or two changes, but I have explained the object of the amendment.

After the word "that" in line 10, page 2, strike out the words "the chairman" and insert the words "three members"; in line 11 strike out the words, at the beginning of the line, "and two other members of said committee"; at the end of line 11 strike out the word "the"; and at the beginning of line 12 strike out the words "chairman of," so that as amended the language would be as follows:

That three members of the Committee on Agriculture, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations.

It seems to me there can be no objection to that, and I do not have any idea that anybody will object to it. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate to argue it, because I believe it will appeal to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska offers the amendment to the amendment which will be reported by the Secretary.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 10, after the word "that," insert the words "three members"; then, in the same line, strike out the words "the chairman," and in lines 11 and 12 strike out the words "the chairman of," so that it will read:

That three members of the Committee on Agriculture, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. If this amendment is agreed to, then I shall ask unanimous consent that the same amendment be inserted wherever the other committees are referred to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to propound a parliamentary inquiry, and instead of propounding it to the Chair I will propound it to the Senator from Nebraska. If I understand this amendment, there is no provision that any one of these three members shall be a member of the minority party.

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is not. As far as that is concerned, however, let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that the language as it stands does not make that distinction, either.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that.

Mr. NORRIS. My amendment does not change it in that respect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where a chairman appoints three members, the custom of taking one of those members from the adverse party has grown so strong that it has the force and sacredness of law.

Mr. NORRIS. The same thing is true of a committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator proposes to change it so that instead of the chairman appointing the three members, the committee shall appoint them, and he ought to safeguard the bipartisan character of the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I am perfectly willing to safeguard it. I am perfectly willing to say that one of them shall be a member of the minority party.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that where the Senator says three members——

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think there will ever be a case where they will all be selected from one political party; but I am perfectly willing to accept an amendment if the Senator will offer it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that where the Senator proposes the insertion of the words "three members," he add the words "one of whom shall be a member of the minority."

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment, as modified by the Senator from Nebraska.

The READING CLERK. As modified, the amendment to the amendment would make the clause read as follows:

That three members, one of whom shall be a member of the minority party, of the Committee on Agriculture, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator from Nebraska accepted an amendment to his amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I simply modified my amendment to correspond to the suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WARREN. That brings an entirely new matter in which we have never had in our rules. Of course, it will always be true that there will be a member of the minority party on such a committee, but I do not believe that the Senator should put that clause in.

Mr. NORRIS. I put it in to bring harmony. I do not care for it, and if I am getting into trouble by putting it in, I will, of course, leave it off.

Mr. WARREN. I will not object to the amendment if the Senator takes off that part of it. In view of the fact that we have gone for a hundred years without anything in our legislation which provides that there shall be so many Republicans and so many Democrats selected for service on conference committees, I would like to continue along that line. There has never been any complaint in a hundred years that I know of.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator; but I am just as much in favor of having the minority represented on a conference committee as is the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WARREN. And so am I, absolutely. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that in all my long service here there never has been a complaint, and never will be, not only with me but with any other Senator who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Wyoming perhaps did not hear what I said a moment ago. The present status has been sanctified by time and by precedent. No chairman of any committee would dare appoint conferees without giving the minority representation, because the precedent has become sacred by long usage; but the moment we make a change and deprive the chairman of the right to appoint the conferees and say that that power shall rest in the committee, then a motion may be made by any member of the committee to appoint any three named members as conferees, and the motion would be in order and no objection could be made to it.

If the Presiding Officer of this body appointed three conferees with the minority totally unrepresented, he would disgrace himself in the estimation of the Senate and of the country, because he would be violating the long-established custom; but when we make a change in the custom we open the door wide and the committee may not follow the precedent which chairmen hitherto have followed. The only reason why the chairmen have followed it is because it was very early established as a part of the ethics of this body; and the Senator knows as well as I do that when we vest responsibility in an individual he obeys the custom and the precedents, but when we vest it in a body of men they are not bound by any precedents unless we name the limitations under which they operate.

Of course, if the pending amendment is adopted with regard to this particular committee, it ought to be adopted with regard to all the others. I thought I would ask unanimous consent later that wherever the language occurred about three members, the words "one of whom shall be a member of the minority" shall be inserted.

Mr. WARREN. I appreciate the point the Senator from Mississippi makes. I am sorry to say that I can not believe that it ought to go into the rule, and therefore I shall have to object to the whole matter and leave it with the chairmen, rather than have the committees select the members. I would have no objection to it, but I am opposed to expressing in our legislation an utter lack of confidence in the members of our different committees. They have always acted well and they always will, undoubtedly, so I think we would better let the matter remain as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, as proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator's amendment cover the situation now without my suggestion embodied in it?

Mr. NORRIS. It does.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the negative). I make the same announcement with reference to my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ERNST. Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

I was also requested to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] on official business.

So Mr. NORRIS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I reoffer the amendment without the modification. I offer it now as I offered it originally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be reported by the Secretary.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, strike out the words "the chairman" and insert "three members," so that it will read:

"That three members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to be selected by said committee,"

And so forth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask that the amendment be read again?

Mr. NORRIS. I think I can state the effect of it so that the Senator will understand it more easily than he would from the reading. It is the same amendment that I offered originally without the modifying words that I put in before at the request of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "one of whom shall be a member of the minority."

Mr. NORRIS. We have had a square vote on that on a roll call and it has been defeated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This will be defeated—at least so far as one vote can help to defeat it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think so. We have had a test vote on it. Will not the Senator allow us to have a fair test vote without the language he proposes to have inserted? I am just as anxious, I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection, but there will be at least one vote less for it.

Mr. NORRIS. There always ought to be one minority member of a conference, and it will be that way, in my judgment, just the same as though we had it in the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would take it for granted that the principle has become somewhat sacred in every free country, and there are no free countries which are not governed by two parties where it would not be observed except that here lately——

Mr. NORRIS. I make the point of order against the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi on the ground that it is an amendment in the third degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was about to observe that here lately I saw a principle equally sanctified in time violated by the Executive when he appointed the commissioners to settle our debt with Europe. The Executive found it possible to appoint them all from one party. So I am not prepared to believe that a committee, after we have destroyed the prerogative of the chairman to appoint conferees, would be bound by the old, long-established precedents.

I have no objection to withdrawing my motion and letting the Senator have a vote upon his motion without my suggestion, but, for one, while I voted for his motion with the suggestion embodied in it, I should certainly vote against his motion without the suggestion, because I know as well as I know my name that the very first time a committee appoints conferees the question will come up in the committee as to whether it is permissible to appoint exclusively members of the majority party, and the argument will be made that a motion with a provision for minority representation was voted down, and that subsequently a motion to put in a proposition of like character was withdrawn, and the contention will be made that having destroyed the precedent of the chairman appointing the conference committee, having put the appointment in the committee instead of the chairman, the old rule of ethics does not apply. I know that as well as I know that my name is JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS. Therefore I shall vote against the motion without that limitation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment to the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to offer another amendment to the amendment; but first I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to the committee amendment which has just been adopted be inserted in each case where the provision is made in the proposed amendment to the rules for additional members to come from other committees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall be forced to object to the request for unanimous consent unless there accompanies the request a provision that at least one member of the minority shall be selected.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I offer the same amendment to the amendment in each of the other instances in the committee amendment where it will apply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment to the amendment which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 16, it is proposed to strike out the words "that the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee" and to insert "that three members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to be selected by said committee."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the words "that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee," and to insert "three members of the Committee on Military Affairs, to be selected by said committee."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and two other members of said committee, to be selected by the chairman of said committee," and to insert "that three members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to be selected by said committee."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I renew my request for unanimous consent for the adoption of the same amendment in each of the other cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by him to the amendment of the committee may be made in the other portions of the amendment relating to the different committees concerning which the amendment may apply.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just one moment. I have indicated why I can not fail to object to that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object?

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator to consent that we vote at one time on all the other amendments to the amendment. Instead of taking up each one separately, let us vote on them en bloc. I think the Senator will not object to that, and I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I suggest to the Senator to make the motion that in connection with the other amendments the change shall be made.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if the Senator from Mississippi objects, we shall have to take a separate vote on each amendment to the amendment. I have offered each one of the amendments. I ask that we vote on all of the amendments to the amendment at once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not consent to sacrifice the right of the minority or to run any risk as to the right of the minority; so I refuse consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the committee amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, line 9, after the word "Appropriation," in the amendment inserted in that place relative to the Committee on the District of Columbia, it is proposed to strike out the words "that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and two other members of said committee to be selected by the chairman of said committee," and to insert "that three members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to be selected by said committee."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreement to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, line 16, after the word "war," it is proposed to strike out "that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and two other members of said committee," and to insert "that three members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to be selected by said committee."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe that concludes all of the amendments I have offered to the committee amendment, does it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I have another amendment, for which I ask the attention of the Senate for just a few moments. I have stated a number of times that I wanted to strike out all of the committee amendment after the word "however," in line 10, on page 2.

I want to eliminate from the committee amendment all of that portion which provides that from the respective committees that have heretofore had jurisdiction of appropriation measures three members shall be sent to the Committee on Appropriations whenever an appropriation bill, which would otherwise go to those committees, shall be considered by the Committee on Appropriations.

I realize from the discussion which has taken place on this proposed rule that such an amendment would fail. I feel deeply interested in it, and I think the Senate is making a sad mistake to build up the Appropriations Committee with a number of Senators who will be on that committee to-day and off it to-morrow. The only argument that has appealed to me as being logical and the one that has been persisted in and which I think has some merit is that if we adopt my proposed amendment now it will deprive the Appropriations Committee of the services of the members of other committees who are more or less familiar now with the various appropriation bills. I think there is something in that contention.

It is said that after a few years we may take the question up again and further amend the rule, because then the Appropriations Committee will have become familiar with the other appropriation bills as they are already familiar with the appropriation bills which are now within its jurisdiction.

I desire to offer an amendment which will automatically eliminate the representation of other committees after a sufficient time has elapsed for the Appropriations Committee to become familiar with its work. So I move, Mr. President, to insert after the word "That," in line 10, page 2, the words "until the close of the Sixty-seventh Congress." If the Senator from Wyoming, or any other Senator, objects seriously to the limitation of the Sixty-seventh Congress, I will make it the Sixty-eighth Congress; but, if Senators will accept the suggestion, I will make it the Sixty-seventh Congress; so that it will read in this way:

Provided, however, That, until the close of the Sixty-seventh Congress, three members of the Committee on Agriculture—

And so on and so forth—shall be members of the Committee on Appropriations.

I offer the amendment to meet the argument that the Committee on Appropriations needs the assistance of three members from each of the other appropriating committees until they familiarize themselves with the work. I ask the Senator from Wyoming if he will not accept that amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have great respect for the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska and all the more so when in taking the stand he has taken he deprives himself of whatever privilege he might enjoy under the proposed rule in sitting as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. However, after some twenty-odd years of the practice of referring appropriation measures to various committees instead of to one committee, under the rules which were adopted many years ago, the conditions became such that the Committee on Appropriations felt that the only proper course was to call upon the Committee on Rules to suggest a new rule which, in that committee's judgment, would harmonize matters and instead of adding to the confusion would eliminate as much of the confusion as was possible. So they have brought in this report, and I would not feel that I could in good faith accept an amendment of the kind suggested by the Senator.

Having myself served on the Committee on Appropriations when all of the appropriation bills were considered by the Committee on Appropriations, I know how possible and how practicable it is for that committee, with the proper selection of its personnel, to carry on its work and conduct its business in the manner which the Senator from Nebraska indicates. However, the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska as to a time limit after which the provision in regard to members of other committees sitting ex officio with the Appropriations Committee shall not apply, carries with it in my mind the idea that, having adopted this principle and having followed it for some months or years, it will prove itself to be satisfactory to the Senate, on the one hand, or, on the other, if it shall meet with disfavor, then I presume the Senate would immediately repeal it. Of course they could repeal it at any time after it becomes a part of the rules. So I would not be able, on behalf of the committee, to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to say merely a word or two. Personally I would favor the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, and, if my judgment alone would control the matter, I would gladly vote for it. I am inclined to think, however, that the majority sentiment of the Senate at the present time is in favor of the proposition that is now contained in the resolution, and so I would be afraid that if the amendment were adopted the Senate might reject the whole proposition. I think that would be very unfortunate and very unwise. So I am perfectly willing to take the judgment of what I believe to be a majority of the Senate.

In line with the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I think, if the plan should not work out satisfactorily, there would be no trouble about the Senate amending the rule and doing what the Senator from Nebraska now proposes to do. After a certain lapse of time, if the various committees should be dissatisfied with the manner in which the rule is working or should be dissatisfied with having three of their members from time to time taken off the committees and away from their legislative work, they would ask the Senate then to make the change, and there would be no trouble about making it. For that reason, although personally I think the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska suggests the best course to be followed, I shall vote against it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is discouraging to me to have my friend from Washington [Mr. JONES] cheer me up so by saying that he is personally in favor of an amendment that I offer, and then, after I have been lifted up to the skies in the bright hope of his able support, to have him announce that he is going to vote against it. I think it illustrates what has been mentioned before, Mr. President, that we are apt to follow the lead of the committee. I speak of that with perfect respect. I do not agree with it, but other Senators do. They have as good a right to their opinion as I have to mine; but I think we have had it illustrated to-day on the roll call on the first amendment that I offered. Most of the Senate, I think, were favorable to it. All were in favor of the principle involved. Some thought it better not to state it in words, but they all wanted to carry out the principle of having the minority represented on this committee; but because the chairman of the committee having the resolution in charge was opposed to it, the Senate, as far as his side of the Chamber was concerned, voted almost to a man to sustain the committee on the roll call, although a majority of them had not heard the debate.

Some Senators say we are afraid to give any more power to the Committee on Appropriations. If we did not have a provision in this proposed rule that takes away the legislative jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, I should be opposed to the entire change. I think, however, that provision relieves it of all danger; but if there is anything in that argument, we are building up here a Committee on Appropriations that will constitute a majority of the Senate when every Member of the Senate votes. That, in reality, is what we will do. They will not be members of the committee all the time; they will be on again and off again; but when it comes to voting they probably will have a prejudice—if such a prejudice ever exists in favor of a committee—in favor of the Appropriations Committee, because part of the time they are going to be on the committee. So if we are going to follow committees we will have a voting proposition in the Senate that will make everything in the past look like 30 cents.

The committee is not to blame for that. I am not criticizing the committee. I am simply asserting that if there is anything in the argument, that Senators come in and blindly follow the committee, which they do, as everybody knows, and probably ought to do, because they can not always be posted on every proposition that comes up—we are constituting now a committee that will be over 40 in number.

Mr. President, there are only two reasons for doing it. One is to put it in so as to ease up gradually on these Senators who are losing some of their power in the other committees that heretofore have had appropriation bills. The other is to assist the Committee on Appropriations, and give it information for a time, by putting on its roll Members who are posted better than they are on some of the appropriation bills that will go to that committee. That objection is met by the amendment I have offered. Let them do that until the end of this Congress, or, if anybody wishes—I do not care—let it be done until the end of the next Congress. The Senator from Washington says, however, that he favors the amendment as I have offered it, and I have no doubt that that is the position of a large number of other Members who are going to follow the Senator from Washington, who is an honored member of the Appropriations Committee, and is also the chairman of one of the standing committees that heretofore has had appropriation bills, and that now will be entitled to have three of its members placed upon the roll of the Appropriations Committee.

The Senator says we can change this rule in the future. Technically, that is true; but all Senators know how difficult it is to get that kind of a change. I shall be out of the Senate, and the Senator from Washington will be dead from old age before that change will be brought about if it is not made now, in my humble judgment.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. If it be true that the change could be made in the future, would it not be reasonable for the Senators supporting the amendment to the rule to accept the change at this time?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. It seems to me it would.

Mr. McCORMICK. If they are not in precise agreement with the Senator from Nebraska, a conference might bring them into agreement, at least in so far as the chairmen of the committees may be concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me say further that if this amendment is agreed to I shall not move to strike out all of the language. I shall accept it as it is. If it is not agreed to, I shall have to ask the Senate at least to take another vote on my proposition to strike it all out.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator state again the length of time his amendment provides for?

Mr. NORRIS. Until the close of the Sixty-seventh Congress. That means that all the appropriation bills for this session and all the appropriation bills for next session will be provided for under the rule with the three additional members from the other committees.

Mr. KING, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. McCORMICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Utah, who rose first.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on behalf of some of us who have been absent from the Chamber attending committee meetings, I should like to ask the Senator the full significance of his amendment, and to what extent it would affect the general rules now existing?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator has the printed resolution before him——

Mr. KING. I am entirely familiar with that.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to insert, after the word "That" in line 10, on page 2, the words "until the close of the Sixty-seventh Congress," so that the proviso, which constitutes in words the largest part of the amendment, will be in force only during the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Mr. KING. And the Senator thinks that at the expiration of that time this experiment will have demonstrated whether it is wise or otherwise? Is that the object?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Nebraska intended to put me in the wrong light in my position on this matter, and yet it seems to me that he did.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator feels that way, I want to apologize to him and assure him that I have no such disposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know the Senator has not.

Mr. NORRIS. I had no such intention, and I was not aware that I had done that. I assure the Senator that if I have said anything that has that effect I shall be very glad to take it all back and strike it out.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I knew absolutely that the Senator did not intend that. My recollection is, however, that the Senator started out by saying that what I had said illustrated how Senators follow committees. I am not taking my position on this proposition because of any committee action, or for the purpose of following the committee, or anything of the sort. I am taking my position with reference to this matter on the same principle, in my judgment, that the Senator from Nebraska would allow this adopted provision to run for a year or two. I think he thinks that he can come closer to effecting the proposal that he makes now than to cut this out right now and refer these bills directly to the committee. He thinks there is a better chance of securing its adoption. I think that is true. It is no compromise of conviction for a Senator to take a course like that. It is simply a question of what he may think, under all the circumstances, it is best to do.

I thought I stated pretty clearly that the reason why I did not feel like voting for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska was because I feared that if it were adopted the Senate would vote down the whole proposition. That is what I am afraid of. I think I know somewhat the sentiment of various Senators. I have heard them express themselves, and I know that there is quite a feeling among members of the different committees that have been making appropriations heretofore that they do not like to see this power taken away from their committees, and they are reconciled to it by having representation on the Appropriations Committee when their bills are under consideration. I believe that the membership of the Post Office Committee, for instance, are better satisfied with the proposition that when the Post Office bill is up three members of their committee shall aid in its consideration than they would be with a proposition to have them cut off entirely from participating in its consideration. Personally I should be in favor of doing that right now, not because I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations but because I believe it to be the best thing to turn all these appropriations over to the Appropriations Committee as it stands. That would be my personal preference, and I think that would be the preference of the Senator from Nebraska, instead of extending for a couple of years the time when it shall take effect; but I doubt if that proposition would be approved by a majority of the Senate, and so I am perfectly willing to compromise some part of my judgment—not of my conviction, because that is not involved—in order to get results, in order to get what I think would be better than the condition that confronts us now.

Mr. President, that is a perfect expression of my position in the matter. To reiterate, personally I believe that in the end it would be the best thing for the whole Senate if the Appropriations Committee, constituted with the membership that it has, were given full authority over appropriations, and if the various other committees had full and complete authority over legislation. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that the vital thing here, so far as the Senate itself is concerned, is really the matter of taking away the possible power of the Appropriations Committee to legislate if any Member of the Senate does not desire it to do so. I think that is a very important thing, and I think putting all of these appropriation bills before the Appropriations Committee will make the other committees more jealous of their rights and their powers over legislative matters, and they will see to it that the Appropriations Committee does not overstep its jurisdiction.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, in my judgment, if we propose to carry out the real intent of a modern budget system we shall sooner or later be compelled to adopt the very provision that the Senator from Nebraska now proposes. We should approach the entire question from a very broad standpoint, satisfied that the Appropriations Committee will carry out the great responsibilities delegated to them as a disbursing board similar and parallel to a disbursing board in any successful business enterprise. A modern budget originates with the Budget officer in connection with the estimates made by the departments, and is then transmitted to the Congress by the President. If we do not make the appropriations in the ordinarily accepted business way that has inspired budgets and has been accepted by all successful concerns, then, in my judgment, the entire plan will be a failure.

I agree entirely with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in this matter. I would prefer to see the Committee on Appropriations at once charged with the full responsibility of making the appropriations for all the departments of the Government, without temporary influence from other committees, upon which they might sooner or later to some extent fall back. From the standpoint of the administration of a business budget, accepted throughout the business world, in my judgment, it must ultimately be carried out in that manner if it is to be successful.

I recognize, as does the Senator from Nebraska, the peculiar conditions which exist here; the fact that for years and years we have had the other system; the realization that separate committees necessarily are better acquainted with the subject matter over which they exercise a certain jurisdiction, and perhaps for a year or so the assignment of members of those committees to the Committee on Appropriations will be helpful because of that knowledge; but if it was with any other idea that these three men were assigned, ex officio, to temporary membership on the Appropriations Committee, then I think we would be initiating the Budget system by making a most monumental error.

One committee must assume the responsibility and be in a position so that they can not separate or delegate the responsibility. The fundamental principle of a budget system is to estimate the income and to make the disbursements accordingly, and just the moment you divide those responsibilities with members of the other committees, particularly interested in the activities of that particular work—be it Army, Navy, Post Office, Commerce, or whatever department—just that moment you are not carrying out the real intent of successful budget making and budget balancing. You would be inviting the very thing we have had—only in a minor degree, I will admit, because this is a great step forward—the encouraging of deficits, as we have to-day, always have had, and always will have as long as separate committees have the responsibility they have had or even if a few members of separate committees have the responsibility.

When you can charge the one committee with the entire responsibility and their clerical force is organized for the purpose of carefully arranging and having at hand the details of income and all the allowances for the various departments of the Government are in one appropriation bill or under one committee and the expenditure is kept, in the ordinary business way, within the Budget, then we will have a modern budget system.

I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that it will be very much more difficult, when we are not in the atmosphere and not really dealing with a settlement of the details of the Budget system, to make further changes. Now, we have a rule before us, and we realize and recognize that we must make certain changes in order to meet the situation at the other end of the Capitol and in order to cooperate with the executive system so successfully operating at the other end of the Avenue.

This is the time to make the changes and to provide ultimately to have responsibility centered, as it must be centered if the administration of the Budget is to be successful, giving two years' leeway, which I think is wise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST (when his name was called). With the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have a general pair with that Senator, and in his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. COLT. Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. KING. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and vote "nay."

I desire also to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained on business of the Senate.

Mr. FERNALD (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the negative). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the transfer of that pair to the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], I will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Capper	France	McCormick	Stanfield
Caraway	Heflin	McKellar	Stanley

So Mr. NORRIS's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I move, after the word "That," on line 10, page 2, that there be inserted the words "beginning with the December, 1922, session of the Congress."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 10, after the word "That," insert the words "beginning with the December, 1922, session of the Congress," so as to make it read:

That, beginning with the December, 1922, session of the Congress, three members of the Committee on Agriculture, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations—

And so forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before my amendment to the amendment is voted on, I wish to say that a great many of the appropriation bills have been virtually prepared. Take the Post Office appropriation bill, for instance. I think we have some 15 items of general legislation on that bill. It has already been considered carefully by the committee in the greatest detail, it has been tentatively agreed to, and it seems to me that to undo that now, put it in the hands of another committee, and make it impossible for us to add that very much-needed legislation to the appropriation bill, would be a great mistake. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the Senator's amendment. I wish he would tell me what it provides.

Mr. McKELLAR. It provides that on page 2, line 10, after the word "That," there be inserted the words "beginning with the December, 1922, session of the Congress."

Mr. NORRIS. That means that it would not take effect until when?

Mr. McKELLAR. Until next December.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume the Senator, when he speaks of the Post Office appropriation bill, has reference to the bill which is now before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have reference to that bill.

Mr. NORRIS. My understanding is that the adoption of this rule would not affect that reference. The bill is already here and has been referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know what effect it would have upon it. I think it would have the effect of immediately vacating it, and if any appropriation bill is reported with legislation on it it would be subject to the rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. McKELLAR. How could it be otherwise?

Mr. NORRIS. The rule, so far as a point of order is concerned, applies to the Committee on Appropriations only. The bill to which the Senator has reference has already passed the House, has been in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and they now have it there.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I gladly yield.

Mr. WARREN. That bill is in the hands of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and we could not take it from that committee. The Committee on Appropriations could not take it from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads if they would, and would not if they could. That bill, I hope, will come out at an early date from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and under their guidance I hope it will pass without any interference on the part of other committees.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us take the Post Office appropriation bill, for illustration: When the bill comes from the committee it will not be subject to this rule. Is that the understanding—that it will not be subject to a point of order? Here is a rule that applies to appropriation bills. Is it possible that the rule will be held not to affect legislation that comes in an appropriation bill from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads?

Mr. WARREN. What the Senator is talking about is in effect already. In fact, the first part of the rule is simply a repetition of the rule as it now stands to-day in the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me read the Senator's proposed amendment:

And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it is made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate.

That has reference to general legislation. Further down in the proposed amendment this language is found:

And if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate—

It does not say by the Appropriations Committee, but any committee. I suppose it refers to—containing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill.

I take it, if we adopt the rule and if the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reports the present Post Office appropriation bill to the Senate containing 15 or any number of items of general legislation, that all any Senator would have to do would be to rise in his place and make a point of order against the bill because it contains this new legislation, and it would go back to the committee. I do not see how it could be avoided. If the Senator from Wyoming would point out how it can be avoided I would like to have him do so. I can not see it.

Mr. WARREN. Is the Senator trying to get something through in that bill which is contrary to the usual practice? I assume not, of course.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; not at all; but the committee has already in its discussions agreed upon, my recollection is, about 15 items of general legislation; that is, they are usually held to be general legislation. That legislation is very much needed by the department in many particulars and many respects. Of course that legislation would be subject to a point of order, and the whole bill would go back to the committee. That is the reason why I have introduced the amendment postponing the effect of the rule until the next session of Congress.

I think it would be confusion worse confounded to undertake to deal with those bills now right in the middle of the session, when some bills have already been reported out and passed and others are in the course of preparation in the various committees. The Committee on Military Affairs has a bill of its own to report out later, and it will be subject to a point of order if anything is contained in it in the way of legislation for the Army.

It seems to me the language ought to be corrected and the rule ought to take effect in the future. I see no better time for making that correction, if the rule is to be adopted, though I am opposed to any change in the rule absolutely, but if the majority have agreed upon it and we are obliged to have the rule, it ought to take effect at some time in the future when we know just what will happen.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I offer a suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think there is considerable force to what the Senator has said, but——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, we do not know what the Senator from Tennessee is talking about until we can have his proposed amendment written and read from the desk. I would like to know what the Senator is offering.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was going to suggest making the amendment apply only to appropriation bills that are now here and that have gone to other committees than the Committee on Appropriations. I think there is only one.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Tennessee is certainly not quite up with the times, because there is only one appropriation bill in the Senate that is not already in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. There are others in preparation in the House, it is true, but when they come here they will be referred according to the rules of the Senate as those rules may be in existence when the bills come over here.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would certainly take in the Post Office appropriation bill, which is virtually completed. I know that is true, because I serve on that committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is no contest about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would take it out of the hands of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator present his amendment, so we may have it read and understand what it is?

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the Secretary read the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "That," insert the following:

beginning with the third session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Mr. WARREN. That will not do. If the Senator wants to except but one bill, that is entirely another matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I suggest to the Senator, too, that this rule would not apply to the Post Office appropriation bill when it is reported, because it is not reported from the Committee on Appropriations. A point of order that would send a bill back to the committee is only upon an amendment to a bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us see whether that is correct or not. I call the attention of the Senator and the Senate to the part of the amendment beginning in line 4, page 2:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill—

"If an appropriation bill." It does not make any difference where it comes from at any time, whether the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads or anywhere else—

is reported to the Senate—

That includes the bill to which the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have virtually agreed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe that the Senator's construction would not be given by the Presiding Officer or the Senate as he has outlined it. Let us read further. It would look to me to be clear that the rule applies only to general appropriation bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations. Let us read it clear through and see:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate—

The Senator thinks that means from any committee, and if we did not read it all we might reach that conclusion—and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill, and if the point is sustained the bill shall be recommitted—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, where?—

Mr. WARREN. Recommitted.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; recommitted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it would go right back there.

Mr. NORRIS. Take the case of the Post Office appropriation bill. Suppose the committee agree upon that bill after we have adopted this rule. The question then arises whether the rule applies to that bill. I submit that anyone reading the entire rule would say it can have no application, because if we enforce it the bill would be recommitted, and that means sent back to the place from whence it came. The rule says "recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations," not to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is absolutely right in his construction.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no doubt in the world about the language and there can not be any doubt how the Presiding Officer would construe it. If it is not the intention to include the present Post Office appropriation bill, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he will accept an amendment like this: In line 6, after the word "Senate," insert the following:

If an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate other than the pending Post Office appropriation bill.

That will exclude it.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer that amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest to the Senator some language that it seems to me would be less objectionable than that. Why not say, if the Senator wants it—although I do not think it is necessary—"if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate by the Appropriations Committee," or "by said committee."

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the other way is the better way to arrange it. There can not be any doubt about it then.

Mr. NORRIS. This is going to be a permanent rule. If it was a temporary affair, I would not object to the wording the Senator from Tennessee suggests.

Mr. McKELLAR. But we are taking over for the Appropriations Committee the work of the various other committees. The work has been done in our committee, and the Post Office appropriation bill is virtually completed.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator wait just a moment? There is no objection to the Senator's exception of that bill if he refers only to the present Post Office appropriation bill, but so far as he has read his amendment it would constitute part of a standing rule hereafter applicable to other Post Office appropriation bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. What suggestion would the Senator from Wyoming make about it?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that it would meet the point at which he is driving to add a proviso at the end of the rule providing that the rule shall not apply to those bills which have already been referred to the committees of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is satisfactory to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I am willing to so arrange it.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator has the confidence that I have in the Assistant Secretary at the desk, let me say that I have no objection to the exception being made to the present Post Office appropriation bill that is in the hands of that committee, and to permitting the Assistant Secretary to prepare an amendment to that effect; but I would object to having it generally apply hereafter to that particular bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I may, I withdraw the amendment which I have offered, and propose after the word "justice," on page 3, to strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following:

Provided, That this rule shall not apply to the Post Office appropriation bill——

Mr. WARREN. Let the Assistant Secretary state it.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That this rule shall not apply to the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

Mr. WARREN. There is no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I serve notice that I shall offer a certain amendment, but before doing so I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the effect on Indian appropriations if the proposed rule is adopted in its present form. Of course, it will do no good to do that. There are not more than three Senators on the other side now present in the Senate who are interested in appropriations for the Indian tribes. I am sorry there are not more present now. Of course, questions will be asked them, perhaps, when they return to their States and their constituents wake up to the fact that a rule has been adopted here that takes away from the Indian Affairs Committee the power and authority to make appropriations for their respective Indian tribes, and that it has been given over to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, and that under that rule the appropriations they have received for years can not be made and will not be made under existing law. Arizona and Nevada and Washington and Colorado will be affected by it. Of course, Oklahoma will be more affected than will any other State, because more Indians live within its borders than in any other State. It is useless for me to try to pick out in a resolution which proposes to change the rules of the Senate a defect that will rob Indian tribes of the appropriations which they have received for years. It will have no effect unless the champions of those Indians on the floor of the Senate aid in the fight.

Of course, I know that there is a coterie of Senators here with influence and power who are grasping for more power, and under this rule will obtain it. If clerks or employees of the Senate are interested in the political welfare of absent Senators who represent States in which there are tribes of Indians, they would do well to summon them here, for there shall be a roll call. At present only the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON], the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], and the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] are in their seats on the Republican side of the Chamber; and yet we are now discussing and are about to adopt a rule which will take away from the committee that has heretofore provided appropriations for the Indian tribes the right to bring in a bill for that purpose.

I base that statement on the ground that there are at least a hundred provisions in the Indian appropriation bill wherein appropriations are made for the education and civilization of certain tribes. That is done without authority of law; but it has been a beneficent act on the part of the Government to make these appropriations year by year. There is, however, not a line of law giving authority for such appropriations. I have here the act of the last Congress making appropriations for Indians and I wish to read certain portions of it. Those provisions could not be included in the bill under the language of the pending resolution, for it provides that—

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill, and if the point is sustained, the bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

So when the Committee on Appropriations is given this proposed enlarged authority and they begin to provide for the appropriation of money, say, for the support and civilization of Indians in Arizona to the amount of $190,000, there being no authority of law for the appropriation, some Senator will make the point of order against it; and if no other Senator does so, I shall, not because I am against such appropriations but because I wish to show the rottenness of the system that will concentrate in the hands of a few Senators on the Appropriations Committee the power to decide what appropriations shall be made for all the interests of the entire United States. So all that need be done if this resolution shall pass is simply for a point of order to be made, and not merely the particular provision as to which the point of order is made will go out, but, under the proposed rule, the appropriation bill will be recommitted to the Appropriations Committee.

There are now fewer Senators on the other side of the Chamber than there were a moment ago. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], however, has now come into the Chamber.

Mr. WARREN. I observe, Mr. President, that on the side of the Chamber of the Senator from Mississippi there are only three Democratic Senators present.

Mr. HARRISON. The attendance is full over here.

Mr. NORRIS. How can they get full now?

Mr. HARRISON. Because they have been associating with Members on the Republican side.

But, Mr. President, I wish to get back to this discussion. This is a very serious matter. If I am wrong in my construction of the proposed rule, I wish the chairman of the powerful Committee on Appropriations to tell me wherein I am wrong. I put the question to him now.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Mississippi can not be wrong.

Mr. HARRISON. I know I am not wrong about this matter.

Mr. WARREN. I do not know what the Senator is talking about; but he must be right.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator from Wyoming. I say that under the provision of the pending resolution which prevents any new or general legislation being brought in on an appropriation bill, if a point of order is made against such provision the whole bill shall be recommitted to the Appropriations Committee. Am I wrong in that statement?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. That is the rule to-day, only, instead of going back to the committee, under the present practice as to which the point of order is made, if the point be sustained, the item goes out of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that is right. So that, under the present practice, if a general appropriation bill contains such an item of general legislation, and the point of order is made against it, if the point be sustained, the particular provision goes out, but the entire bill does not go back to the committee.

I have stated that under the head of Indian appropriations there are many items for which there is no authority of existing law. I will read some of those items. For instance, under the heading of "California," there are items:

For support and civilization of the Indians of California, * * * $42,000.

* * * * * * *

For the support and education of 750 Indian pupils at the Sherman Institute, Riverside, Calif., * * * $152,600.

* * * * * * *

IDAHO.

For support and civilization of the Indians on the Fort Hall Reservation, in Idaho, * * * $29,000.

* * * * * * *

KANSAS.

For support and education of 750 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Haskell Institute—

And so forth. Yet there is not an iota of law for the appropriation of any money for the civilization and support of any Indians of any tribe in the United States.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator makes that statement to us in a very loud voice, but he knows as well as I do that the fact is quite to the contrary, and that there is authority of law for such items.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator tell me that there is authority of law for an appropriation for the support and civilization of the Indians in Arizona?

Mr. WARREN. In the case of all the Indians, for that matter, for the support of whom provision is made, the action is taken under treaties and laws; and a treaty has the same effect as a law in such cases, as, of course, the Senator well knows.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know it. I happened to have some experience in the other House, and I know that in at least two sessions of Congress while I was a Member practically every provision of the bill was stricken out on points of order because there was no authority of law for them. They are gratuities; they are beneficent acts upon the part of the Government, to provide money for the support and civilization of the Indians. Of course, if an appropriation is designed to carry out some treaty stipulation, the statement I have made would not apply; but only at the last session of Congress, I believe it was, when the scheme of enlarging the Appropriations Committee and taking away from the other committees any authority to provide appropriations was suggested, it will be recalled that a Representative from New York, Mr. SNYDER, made points of order against the various provisions as they came from the Appropriations Committee, and there was nothing but a skeleton left of the bill when he finished; all of the provisions of this character went out; and finally in the House they had to bring in a special rule reported by the Rules Committee to make the items in order.

Of course, there is no authority of law for such provisions, and so if this rule is adopted and the great Appropriations Committee, presided over by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, should bring in the appropriation bill providing for the support and civilization of the Indian tribes, if there is no authority of law for the appropriations, they will go out on points of order and the bill itself will be recommitted to the committee. Yet when the roll is called there will be some Senators who are interested in the Indian tribes and who, knowing these facts—or they should know them, and if they were present here and would listen to and participate in the discussion they would know them—who will vote for the resolution. I put them on guard, so that when they go back, after helping to create that situation, and no appropriation is made to care for the support of the Indians, the responsibility will be upon them.

So, Mr. President, before the consideration of the pending resolution is over I shall offer an amendment to strike out that part of the committee amendment which provides that when new matter is brought in in a general appropriation bill and a point of order is made against it that the bill shall be recommitted to the committee. If that provision shall be stricken out, it will leave the rule as it is to-day, namely, that in the case of general appropriation bills, if there is an item subject to a point of order and the point of order shall be made and sustained, it shall apply only to the particular provision and not affect the whole bill.

But, Mr. President, I am first going to offer an amendment in the form of a substitute that goes to the very meat of this question. The amendment is in the form of a substitute, and I send it to the desk and ask that it may be read, so that I may discuss it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment reported by the committee as amended by striking out all after line 9, on page 2, and inserting the following:

however, when appropriations for rivers and harbors are being considered by such committee, the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Commerce as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Department of Agriculture are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Agriculture as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Diplomatic Consular Service are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Department of War are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Military Affairs as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for Indian Affairs are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Department of the Navy are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the Post Office Department are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriations; when appropriations for the District of Columbia are being considered by such committee the chairman thereof shall appoint three members of such committee as a subcommittee, which, together with the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, shall consider such appropriation. When a bill making appropriations enumerated in this paragraph is in conference, at least two such ex officio members who considered such bill shall be appointed as conferees, one of whom shall be of the minority party.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield before discussing the proposed amendment, did I understand the Senator to state a few moments ago, when I came into the Chamber, that he approved of the system of enacting general legislation as part of a general appropriation bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I think there are instances where it is very advantageous to incorporate general legislation in an appropriation bill. We never would have had rural free delivery in this country had it not been for the incorporation in a general appropriation bill of the provision that started the present system of rural free delivery. The regulation of cotton exchanges was included in a general appropriation bill. The standardization of warehouses came in on a general appropriation bill; and I could enumerate instance after instance of very wise and beneficent legislation that was enacted on general appropriation bills.

Mr. EDGE. Why does the Senator assume that we never would have had any of that remedial or beneficial legislation if it had not been passed through that method? I can not see any reason for such an assumption. If the bills were meritorious—and the bills which the Senator has mentioned certainly were—is there any reason why they could not have been discussed as many other independent or individual measures have been discussed, separately from an appropriation bill, and finally have secured the approval of the majority of the Senate and of the other House and of the President?

I am simply asking the Senator if he approves of the system of using appropriation bills for the enactment of general legislation; that is all.

Mr. HARRISON. I think there are instances where it is very wise to put general legislation on appropriation bills. Of course, as a general rule, I think they should not go there; but there are exceptions to the general rule. I think it is all right, though, to make these appropriations for the civilization and education of these Indian tribes in the general appropriation bill, and if they stay in the bill there must be some law enacted before it can be done in the future.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the chairman, and other members of the Appropriations Committee, who soon will have enlarged authority and greater powers and who have been very constant in their attendance here, appear to feel good over the prospects of their greater influence in the Senate. I do not blame them, for we are about to thrust on them great powers, and none of them are running away from it. Of course, arrayed with the majority are some minority Senators of long standing who stand highest on the committee. They think they will be taken into this new—I will not say "conspiracy," because it is not a conspiracy; there has been no lobbying for this proposition—this new association, not of "nations," but of "persons."

Mr. EDGE. This syndicate, perhaps.

Mr. HARRISON. So it is very hard even to find one of the minority members over here who is the highest man on one of the committees who will oppose this proposition.

This is the finest scheme I ever saw originated by smart men. Senators on the other side know that they would have no chance of passing this resolution in its original form. When the Senator from Wyoming offered it first, he did not ask for an enlargement of the membership of the Appropriations Committee. He did not ask to have three ex officio members brought in from the Agricultural Committee or the Military Affairs Committee or the Naval Affairs Committee or the Commerce Committee; but he asked that all of these bills that formerly were referred to the various other committees should be sent over to the Appropriations Committee, and that the same membership that now composes the Appropriations Committee should consider these bills and handle them.

There were certain very distinguished leaders of the Rules Committee, when they considered the Senator's proposed rule, who knew and told him frankly that he could not get that proposition passed in that form. They said to him, "You may be able to get just the votes of the 18 members of the Appropriations Committee when it comes up, but that will leave some 78 other Members of the Senate, and they will not vote for it." The Senator from Wyoming is wise and able and smart and shrewd. He knows the devious ways of putting through resolutions as well as bills here. There are not any paths that he has not walked. He knows all the movements of the inner circle. He has been a part of the controlling powers that have dominated the Senate of the United States for a long time. When he realized that he would only be able to get 18 votes to give this committee all this power, namely, the votes of the Appropriations Committee, his eyes were opened, and he said to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who is another smart one, now chairman of the Rules Committee, "Well, let us bring in these three ex officio members of the Naval Affairs Committee. That will get LODGE, and that will get PAGE, and that will get the ranking Democrat on that committee."

Let us do the same thing with the Commerce Committee, and that will get JONES of Washington—well, he is already on the committee, and "it will get the next influential Senator." Then they took up the Agricultural Committee, and they thought it would get the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], but he did not fall for it, and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] did not fall for it. I do not know whether the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the ranking Democrat, will fall for it or not. He has been pretty regular in his attendance here.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, what was that language?

Mr. HARRISON. They have offered something to the Senator from Illinois. I have not been able to detect it yet, but I will if he votes for it. It may be that he is a condidate for this vacancy on the Appropriations Committee. No; I beg the Senator's pardon, because Illinois already has a member on the Appropriations Committee—a splendid Senator, a lovable character. He has not been here very long. Of course I know it will be very pleasing to Senators over there who have been here for years to see the power taken away from them and given over to the junior Senator from Illinois, who has been here only a few months; but there is a vacancy there, and no doubt if the junior Senator from Illinois were not on the Appropriations Committee the senior Senator from Illinois would be a candidate for it.

Mr. McCORMICK. He would not.

Mr. HARRISON. I am surprised. He is generally in favor of being on the inside. At any rate, there are a lot of candidates for it, and they have overworked that proposition, and I can see that there is competition over there between certain Senators for the place made vacant by the resignation of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator make his selection?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, I shall not be consulted. You would get a good man if I were.

Mr. WARREN. We are consulting the Senator now for a nomination.

Mr. HARRISON. You have already promised it, I think, and the Senator to whom you have promised it has been very vigilant and very active in defending this resolution.

Mr. WARREN. I have not promised, and I will not promise the Senator from Mississippi, but if he will make a nomination I will consider it.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I shall not get much consideration—not any more than I shall get in the fight I am waging against this proposition; so you can see just what we are up against.

Mr. McCORMICK. The steam roller.

Mr. HARRISON. The steam roller; yes. I know that the resolution is going to pass, but I want to call the attention of the country to the concentration of power here in the Senate—more than there has been in the history of the Senate, I presume, or at least more than since 1896, when it was all in the Appropriations Committee of the Senate and when the Senate saw that it was not working well, that there was too much power in the hands of a few men and that it should be segregated and divided among the Members. Of course, that did not meet the approval of the Senator from Wyoming at that time, because he was a Member of the Senate then, and he is the only Member of the Senate to-day who was a Member of the Senate at that time who voted against it.

Mr. McCORMICK. What about the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator asks me about the Senator from Massachusetts. I am coming to him.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator generally does.

Mr. HARRISON. I always hate to do it, but he makes me do it.

Mr. McCORMICK. "All roads lead to Rome."

Mr. HARRISON. No; some roads are going to lead to destruction, and one of them is going to be in Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMICK. And the Senator from Mississippi and Gov. Cox will lead the way.

Mr. HARRISON. Anybody can lead the way and do the job.

The Senator calls my attention to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. He was a Member of the Senate at the time this great power was exercised by the Appropriations Committee. He made a speech on that question, and he advocated doing away with that policy. I want to read part of that speech. Of course, it is in line with the general conduct of the Senator from Massachusetts in changing on propositions.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator probably noticed that it was very soon after the Senator from Massachusetts came to the Senate, and as a youth he was likely to do what the Senator from Mississippi so often does—get wrong.

Mr. HARRISON. It was before he had become contaminated over here, though. He voted right in those days.

Mr. WARREN. Did he not keep on voting right, then?

Mr. HARRISON. He has since made a lot of slips.

Here is what the Senator from Massachusetts said at that time, when the Senate had up the question of taking away from the Appropriations Committee the power to make all appropriations and to distribute it around to other committees. Of course, I know this will not have any influence upon Senators on the other side.

I know from service on one committee—

Says the senior Senator from Massachusetts—

I was on the Naval Committee which prepared the naval appropriation bill—how it worked in practice.

He was talking about the other House, and from 1867, I believe, or some time following the War between the States, up until 1885, the House followed the system of one committee making all the appropriations, namely, the Appropriations Committee. They changed that system in 1885.

Mr. McCORMICK. Why?

Mr. HARRISON. They changed it because they saw that there was too much power placed in the hands of one committee, and so, by a vote of 256 to 70, I think it was, they did away with that practice and gave the authority to the various committees to make appropriations.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. And from 1885 up until 1920 or 1921, when the House changed the plan again and brought about all this confusion, they got along splendidly over there by letting the various committees make the appropriations for the various interests of the country. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. Does not the Senator recognize the difference between the situation in those days and the recently installed Budget system, through which now estimates are pruned and considered carefully by men appointed for that specific purpose, with staffs working for weeks and months, and are then brought to the Appropriations Committees and to Congress? Does not the Senator recognize the difference between that kind of preparation and the situation in those days, when each one of those committees probably had to do all the investigating themselves?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes and I am going to tell the difference between then and now. The Senator knows it, so I will not be telling him anything new; but just to refresh his memory I am going to tell him the difference between what happened under this administration, before we got the Budget, and what has happened since we got the Budget. The Senator says the change has been rendered necessary because of the Budget. He did not come to that conclusion, I think, until about 6 o'clock yesterday afternoon, because the argument made then was that because the House had one committee to make these appropriations the Senate had to follow suit, because you could not segregate the bills. That was the reason the Senator from Wyoming outlined in his speech some weeks ago.

Mr. WARREN. That was one of very many reasons.

Mr. HARRISON. That was the main reason. Now, they say it is the Budget. The Budget has nothing to do with this change of policy. The President sends in his estimates after they have been approved by the Director of the Budget. They come here just the same as they did in the old days, in a big Book of Estimates. Some of them are cut down, perhaps some of them are enlarged. The Congress must deal with the proposition the same as it dealt with it in the olden days.

The Senator from Wyoming knows that the House could segregate the propositions and bring in the bills in the same manner and form as they did in former days. They do not do it just that way now. They have one committee, and the plan which I propose, which I expect to discuss, will take care of the situation against which the Senator spoke on yesterday.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] asked me the difference between conditions now, when there is a Budget, and the system in effect in the old times. We used to get our estimates. We would appropriate the money, and we would appropriate enough in a general appropriation bill to take care of the situation. We did not believe in deficiencies. We thought that when you formulated a plan and made an estimate of how much it was going to cost this year, you should stay within those limits; but since the Budget has been adopted under present control of affairs we have more deficiency bills than ever before.

Mr. WARREN. In number or amount?

Mr. HARRISON. In amount and in number.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is getting so extravagant that the facts are not even in sight. The deficiency bills to-day are but a fraction of what they were before. We had one deficiency bill carrying between eight and nine million dollars. We had others carrying hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is one of the fairest Senators here——

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. He knows that you can not compare the figures of to-day with the figures during the war, and that the only fair comparison is of appropriations to-day with appropriations during normal times before the war. The Senator knows that before we entered the war the deficiencies were quite small, never in any instance over $37,000,000, and they were very few in number; but all during this Congress, although it was claimed by the administration that they were going to stay within the estimates originally given to the Congress by the Director of the Budget, we have had three deficiency bills; there is another one being considered in the House and on its way over here; two of them were for over a hundred million dollars each, and the other was so high that the figures just bewilder me.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator would like to be truthful; it is just as easy. We have had but two deficiency bills passed.

Mr. HARRISON. How much did the first one provide for?

Mr. WARREN. Aside from the Veterans' Bureau——

Mr. HARRISON. I am including the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. WARREN. It was about $5,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The amount of the deficiency, I mean.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has just stated the difference between war time and the old times. There is a difference between the present, when there is a hang-over of the war, and the old times. We are now appropriating about half a billion a year for the disabled veterans. Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Wyoming knows that I have been fighting here for months to persuade him and his party to redeem the pledge they made to the soldiers of the country, when they promised them an adjusted compensation bill; yet our efforts have been in vain.

Mr. WARREN. I am talking about the disabled soldiers. Does the Senator object to those appropriations we have made?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course not. I voted for them and voted for amendments to make them larger when the Senator and other Senators over there fought the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to give them a fair amount, which they needed and deserved.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that those things loudly said do not affect the facts.

Mr. HARRISON. The record speaks for itself.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that when he says we have smaller amounts in deficiency bills than in the olden times he forgets that we appropriated less then to run the Government—less than one-tenth what we are appropriating now—and, of course, the deficiency bills were smaller accordingly. Furthermore, there was no war until the Spanish War, and then we had the effect of that. But now we are really in the war, so far as appropriations are concerned, because we are settling these great expenses, besides taking care liberally and well of all the disabled soldiers. The fact that the soldiers who are well and strong have not yet received the amounts which they expected cuts no figure as to the other. They can well wait.

Mr. HARRISON. They know who did it. I thought the Senator was going to answer my question, but he got off on the subject of disabled soldiers. I asked the Senator the total amount of the first deficiency bill passed by this Congress.

Mr. WARREN. About $120,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. How much was the second?

Mr. WARREN. About $90,000,000; and almost all of that for the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. HARRISON. The other was for how many millions? It was enormous. The whole amount was somewhere around $300,000,000, according to the figures which the clerk of the Appropriations Committee gave me the other day. It looks as if it is hard for the Senator from Wyoming and myself to agree.

Mr. WARREN. That is wonderful!

Mr. HARRISON. I started out to read from the speech which the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made away back in 1896, in advocacy of a rule to take away from the Appropriations Committee the power to make all appropriations and place it in other committees, but the Senator from Wyoming diverted me. I suppose it was because he did not want to hear the speech.

Mr. WARREN. I would be very glad to hear it. I would like to hear the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in place of the speech of the Senator from Mississippi. It would be a better speech I am sure.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, as I read it, will have more effect now on the Senator than when the Senator from Massachusetts made it in 1896.

Mr. WARREN. Undoubtedly the Senator is right in that.

Mr. HARRISON. Because it did not have much influence on him then. The Senator from Massachusetts said:

I was on the Naval Committee which prepared the naval appropriation bill and know how it worked in practice.

Mr. WARREN. And he is on the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate now.

Mr. HARRISON. So he speaks by the card. He would not vote for this resolution at this time if he were not under the hypnotic influence of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. He speaks and votes to-day by the card, too.

Mr. HARRISON. Because the Senator from Wyoming tells him what to do.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Massachusetts knows that as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee he will be brought into this coalition, that he will be a part of the "association of persons," if not the "association of nations"; so you have him. You have a lot of them. The Senator from Wyoming holds such a great position, in control of the purse strings of our Government, they naturally will have to come into his office with hats in hand and plead with him, and some of them get on their knees, I imagine, at times.

Mr. WARREN. Just as the Senator from Mississippi has now.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I have not, because it takes all my time to fight the Republican extravagance; but with the great power which the Senator wields, all he has to do is just take that magic wand, and he gets the support of those Senators who have not been here very long; who realize that some day they must get an appropriation; that the powers that be are going to put over this proposition, and that they had better be found on the right side of the ledger when the votes are read, so that the scrutinizing eye of the distinguished Senator from Wyoming will see that they voted right. He will be more liberal with them and they will not have to come into his office with hats in hand; they can have seats near the throne. So I want to read the argument which was made in those days by the distinguished Senator who is to-day the leader of the majority. He said:

In the first place, a committee having only one appropriation bill gives great attention to it, and I think it prepares a better bill than can be prepared by a committee which has 14 bills.

That is what he said in those days. Let me read it again, so that it will burn into Senators' minds, whether they pay any attention to it or not:

In the first place, a committee having only one appropriation bill gives great attention to it, and I think it prepares a better bill than can be prepared by a committee which has 14 bills.

When an appropriation bill comes into the House from the Naval Committee or any other committee which has a single appropriation bill to consider it is subjected to the watchful and very jealous scrutiny of the Committee on Appropriations, who follow everything the other committee undertakes to do.

That is always true. If the Committee on Agriculture to-day had the Agricultural appropriation bill before this body, either the influential Senator from Wyoming or one of his great lieutenants would be on the floor of the Senate all the time, watching every movement, to see that too great an appropriation was not made for the agricultural interests of the country. So the Senator from Massachusetts was right.

Further he said:

Those bills were distributed in the House of Representatives, and there is not a suggestion or a thought in that House of going back to the old system. It is universally conceded that the new system has worked well.

That was the system which was put in force in 1885, when the one-committee idea was abolished and the various committees were given the power to make the appropriations. The Senator from Massachusetts spoke with authority and from experience, as he had observed it in the House from 1885 to 1896, when he made that argument.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator who the witness is he is quoting.

Mr. HARRISON. This is a speech delivered by the distinguished leader of the majority [Mr. LODGE], who has now fallen under the spell of the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The Senator from Massachusetts is running true to form, at one time expressing himself one way, then changing, and at another time expressing himself another way.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, being on both sides of the question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is that the dashing knight the Senator recently referred to?

Mr. HARRISON. He is now the "subdued knight."

Mr. President, of course it is difficult for me to get the distinguished Senators of the majority, who compose the Committee on Appropriations and who are now about the only ones on the floor, to listen to me. For instance, there is the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] reading or studying some bill.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon. Is the Senator from Mississippi still talking?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Mississippi is still on the floor?

Mr. HARRISON. I am still quoting the eloquent remarks of the leader on the Republican side of the aisle.

Mr. WARREN. I did not know but that the Senator had forgotten he was talking, and had gone away somewhere as to his physical being.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator from Wyoming is not paying any attention to what we say. He is not paying any attention to anybody except those whom he thinks he can corral to pass this resolution. He is now thoroughly contented, well pleased, and satisfied that he has enough Members pledged to put over the resolution that will give him greater power, and consequently he proceeds to read and pay no attention to the discussion.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am satisfied that a larger number of Senators would like to be present if they realized that the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is being read, so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	Nelson	Sheppard
Brandegee	Harris	New	Stanfield
Cameron	Harrison	Newberry	Sterling
Capper	Heflin	Norris	Townsend
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Wadsworth
Cummins	Kendrick	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Ernst	Ladd	Phipps	Warren
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pittman	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	Lodge	Rawson	Willis
Gooding	McKinley	Reed

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of absent Senators, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Fernald	King	Oddie	Poindexter

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Bursum	Colt	Glass

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Walsh, Mass.	Sutherland	Smith

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it is evident that the Senator from Mississippi desires to continue for some time longer. It is Saturday afternoon, and rather late in the afternoon. Would not the Senator from Wyoming, if there is no objection, agree to adjourning at this time?

Mr. WARREN. There is objection to adjourning. We have nearly finished with the resolution under consideration, and it is my desire that we should remain in session until it is finished. It was so understood this morning when we started, and I do not now wish to adjourn over to another day. We have been nearly a week considering the matter. I understood from what the Senator from Mississippi told me that he has nearly finished, but I do not wish to cut him short. I would rather stay until midnight than do that.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to quote from some other distinguished Senators who condemned this system, which is about to be put upon us, when it was before the Senate for consideration in 1896. That will take some time, and then I desire to analyze the subject before us.

Mr. WARREN. We are entirely agreeable to patiently hear the Senator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before relative to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. He seems to be absent from the Chamber, and I accordingly withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. COLT. Transferring my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the negative). I make the same announcement as I previously made with reference to my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and will let my vote stand.

While on my feet I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] on official business.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] is necessarily absent from the Chamber and is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. FERNALD (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ERNST. Making the same announcement as before relative to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. EDGE. Transferring my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—9.

Ashurst	McKellar	Reed	Stanley
France	Pittman	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.
Harrison

NAYS—51.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	McKinley	Smith
Brandegee	Gerry	New	Smoot
Bursum	Glass	Newberry	Sterling
Cameron	Gooding	Nicholson	Sutherland
Capper	Hale	Norris	Townsend
Colt	Harris	Oddie	Wadsworth
Cummins	Heflin	Overman	Warren
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Watson, Ga.
Dillingham	Kendrick	Phipps	Watson, Ind.
Edge	Lenroot	Poindexter	Weller
Ernst	Lodge	Ransdell	Williams
Fernald	McCormick	Rawson	Willis
Fletcher	McCumber	Simmons

NOT VOTING—36.

Borah	Harreld	McLean	Robinson
Broussard	Hitchcock	McNary	Shields
Calder	Johnson	Moses	Shortridge
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Myers	Spencer
Crow	Kellogg	Nelson	Stanfield
Culberson	Keyes	Norbeck	Swanson
Dial	King	Owen	Trammell
du Pont	Ladd	Pepper	Underwood
Elkins	La Follette	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 3 last, there was inserted, at his own request, a copy of a letter written by the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] dealing with the Newberry case. The letter is dated January 26, 1922, and is addressed to Mr. Thomas Marshall, lock box 561, Kirkland, Wash., and reads as follows:

DEAR MR. MARSHALL: I appreciate very much your courteous letter of 20th. I have made several statements as to my views of the Newberry case, but do not suppose the newspapers to which they were sent have printed them in such a way as to attract attention.

There is no dispute about the central features of the case. Senator NEWBERRY was not in Michigan during either the primary campaign or the final campaign, but during all that time was serving in the Navy at the place to which he was ordered, New York City. At the same time he had three sons and a brother in the military service. He paid little attention to what was going on in Michigan. It is not charged that he expended any money, or at least no amount subject to criticism. A large amount of money was raised by Republicans in Michigan in his behalf and expended in advertising and other legitimate purposes, although the amount, of course, was larger than it should have been. The incentive, no doubt, which influenced the Republicans in this effort was to offset the tremendous publicity carried on at perhaps ten times the expense of the Republican campaign by Mr. Ford through his various business agencies, probably the greatest publicity organization in the country. The campaign was in 1918, in the spring and early summer, at the critical stage of the war, and it was made a war issue. The entire Wilson administration, with every powerful agency under its command, was for Henry Ford, who was attempting to be nominated on the Democratic ticket as well as on the Republican ticket, and who was a pacifist, had opposed the effort to bring the war to a victorious conclusion, was in favor of a compromise peace, and who had secured the military exemption of his son. I only mention these circumstances to show the conditions under which the campaign was carried on.

I should like, if I may, to have the attention of the Senate while I read two paragraphs of this very remarkable letter:

Senator NEWBERRY was prosecuted, with great venom, by the Democratic administration which had backed Ford, and the powerful machinery of the Government, with its myriad of secret service agents, and with its machinery of district attorneys and marshals, was ordered to the task of securing evidence against NEWBERRY and sending him to prison. This, of course, was also backed up by the powerful influence of Henry Ford, controlling and owning one of the greatest and most powerful and wealthy industrial organizations in the world.

Fortunately for the liberties of the country this tremendous combination was halted by the Supreme Court of the United States—

If I may have the attention of the Senators——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate be in order, so that we can hear what the Senator is saying.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should not care to interrupt their private conversations.

which, in a decision going most thoroughly into the matter in every respect, completely vindicated Senator NEWBERRY of any offense. They also held that the law under which he was prosecuted was unconstitutional, but, in addition to that—

Mark you, if you will hear it—

they went into the merits of the case and held that he had not received a fair trial and that he was not guilty of any misconduct.

Upon a vote in the Senate, in which every Democrat who voted was arrayed against Senator NEWBERRY, following the partisan attacks which had been made upon him in the election and in prosecution referred to above, the Senate, following the Supreme Court of the United States, exonerated him from blame and declared his election to the Senate valid.

The country has been filled with malicious propaganda and false charges as to this case. The assertion is constantly made that Senator NEWBERRY's seat in the Senate was bought for $200,000. As stated above, there is not a single word of evidence to show that a dollar was improperly spent in the general election at which NEWBERRY was elected, and in which the whole matter was fairly submitted to the people of Michigan. It is also repeatedly stated that NEWBERRY bought his seat in the Senate. The evidence shows that he expended no undue amount of money and took no interest in the campaign, but devoted himself to his work in the Navy throughout the campaign, both the primary and final.

Various false assertions have been made as to influences brought to bear to secure votes in NEWBERRY's behalf in the Senate. I notice a detailed statement in that connection published in several Washington State papers as to my own vote. This statement is libelous and false from beginning to end, as no such influences were brought to bear and no such statements or anything resembling them or anything to that effect were made to me.

On the contrary, certain multimillionaire organizations, profiting financially by any popular excitement which they can arouse, were seeking by every means in their power to influence and intimidate Senators to vote against NEWBERRY. This may be referred to in more detail later on.

I want to pause here long enough to say that if there were any influences, corrupt and malign, as the Senator from Washington said, seeking to intimidate Senators and prevent them from voting their honest convictions, the Senate should know it and the country should know it. Therefore, at the conclusion of this statement I am going to offer a resolution asking for an investigation, so that the Senator from Washington may have an opportunity to produce his witnesses to show what those malign influences were that sought to prevent him and other Senators from voting their convictions in the Newberry case.

The concluding paragraph of this wonderful letter is:

To have condemned an innocent man, under the whip and lash of powerful agencies of the kind mentioned above, seeking to control the public affairs of the country, would have been a gross act of injustice.

With sincere regards, very truly, yours,

MILES POINDEXTER.

Mr. President, all agree that those Senators who voted to ratify the purchase of his seat by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] in this body are entitled to the widest latitude in explaining and apologizing to their constituents for so voting. None, I am sure, is inclined to criticize the reasons given, however much they may misrepresent the facts, so long as these explanations and apologies are not inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and thereby sought to be incorporated as a part of the record in the Newberry case itself.

Personally, for the Senator from Washington I entertain a very high regard; but I do not think, in the interest of fairness and truth, the letter should be permitted to go unchallenged.

There are 11 assertions as to what the facts are alleged to be in the Newberry case, and I venture the assertion that every one of them is unsubstantiated and incorrect.

In paragraph 2 the Senator from Washington says, speaking of Mr. NEWBERRY, that he was in New York during the period of the campaign, both the primary election and the general election, and that "he paid little attention to what was going on in Michigan."

In reply one needs but quote the declaration of Mr. NEWBERRY, the junior Senator from Michigan, himself, in his speech of January 12, that his campaign manager and agent, Mr. King, kept him in close touch with what was going on in Michigan. The able Senator from Indiana, Mr. WATSON, a close friend and champion of the Senator from Michigan, also stated that Mr. NEWBERRY was kept informed of the progress of the campaign. NEWBERRY's lawyer also admits that he, NEWBERRY, knew everything that was transpiring in the campaign except about the money. His exact language was this:

I will concede he—

kept in intimate touch with the campaign.

That is from the record, page 532, and was a statement of Mr. Murfin, the chief counsel for Mr. NEWBERRY.

Of course they had to except that he knew about the expenditures of money. Therefore it is hardly to be expected that this statement that Mr. NEWBERRY was not in touch with the campaign in Michigan will be accepted. But, aside from all this, Senator NEWBERRY in his speech of January 9 indorsed in toto everything his "committee" did in his behalf. Therefore he is chargeable with their acts as if these had been performed by his expressed direction. A principal can not accept the benefits of his agents' acts and at the same time repudiate the agency or escape liability for the deeds. That is elementary law.

In the same paragraph the Senator from Washington says:

A large amount of money was raised by Republicans in Michigan in his [NEWBERRY'S] behalf and expended in advertising and other legitimate purposes.

Why did the Senator from Washington say this money was raised by Republicans? He knew it was raised by Senator NEWBERRY'S family and near relatives. Practically every dollar came from them, and it was not a contribution by Republicans as such, but by NEWBERRY'S family.

Did he desire that his constituents should not know this? The evidence further shows that some of this money was drawn out of TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY'S, the Senator's, own account and passed into the campaign fund through his brother's, John Newberry's, account. Permit me to say here that Smith, the confidential agent of Senator NEWBERRY and John Newberry and the whole Newberry estate, so testified—that he drew money out of Senator TRUMAN NEWBERRY'S account and put it in John Newberry's account so as to keep from having an overdraft while he was contributing this money to Senator NEWBERRY'S campaign. One hundred and twenty thousand dollars of it came through John Newberry's account, whether John's money or his brother's; but whether contributed by him or by the Senator is open to argument. It is contended that afterwards some one reimbursed him for $21,000. Who it was nobody seems to know.

As to the manner of disbursing this $263,000 shown to have been expended, and a much larger sum suspected, the Senator from Washington says that it was expended for "advertising and other legitimate purposes."

I am curious to know under which head the Senator from Washington will classify the expenditures that I shall now read. I am going to read the sworn testimony of J. Scott Hunter, of Detroit, who has not been impeached, whose veracity was not even questioned by the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and therefore I presume he could not have been attacked.

He asked me—

He was testifying about going to Newberry headquarters and meeting B. Frank Emery—

He asked me at that time to assist in the campaign, but there was no transaction between us. I returned to headquarters a few days afterwards by appointment. At that time he gave me $300 in currency. He requested me to work for Mr. Newberry's interest with the $300, and he gave me a lot of literature, buttons, etc., to distribute. I took the literature and buttons and I expended this $300. I spent it around advertising Mr. Newberry from one place to another, buying drinks and cigars. I spent the entire $300 that way. * * * After the $300 was gone I paid more visits to the headquarters. * * * Mr. Emery delivered a second $300 to me in cash. I did not give him a receipt. It was given to me for the same purpose. There was nothing mentioned in regards to it. I supposed it was meant for services. I spent it the same way as the other; that is, for liquor and cigars and treating through the city.

I shall be glad if the Senator from Washington will tell us whether that was "advertising" or "other legitimate expenses."

Mr. President, without taking the time of the Senate to read it again now, with the permission of the Senate I shall put into the RECORD another case, that of a gentleman whose name I am not now able to call, but with the Senate's permission I shall have it inserted in the RECORD. He went to Newberry headquarters. He and Paul King, who was the agent of Newberry and his campaign manager, were standing at a table. An employee of this committee brought to him an envelope and laid it down in front of him for him to take with him. He took it, and when he opened it he found that it contained $400. When the Senator from Washington answers, if he sees fit to do so, I shall be glad if he will tell us under which head he classifies this $400—whether it was "advertising" or some other "legitimate expense"; and if it was, I should love to have his definition of what constitutes "legitimate expense."

The matter referred to was subsequently furnished by Mr. CARAWAY, as follows:

John E. Kern testified:

"I reside at Midland, Mich., which is in Midland County, about 135 or 140 miles northwest from Grand Rapids and about 117 miles from Detroit. I am in the real estate business and have lived at Midland about 16 years. * * * Probably a week or so afterwards, and a week or 10 days before the primary, Corliss asked me to go to Detroit to meet Paul King, and I went to Detroit and had a conversation with Mr. King at his office, where I was taken by Mr. Corliss. * * * While Mr. King and I were talking there, and in the presence of King, a sealed envelope was put on the table right beside me there to take all right. I do not recall whether my name was on it or not. I put it in my pocket. I did not open it there. I left Detroit to return to Midland on the evening train. I opened the envelop on the train during the course of the trip and found $400 in it. This occurred, I would judge, between the 15th or 20th, or some place along there, in August, along there, may be the 20th or 25th. I was probably called secretary of the Newberry organization of Midland County."

Mr. CARAWAY. This $600 about which I have been reading was given to one man by Senator NEWBERRY'S campaign committee to be expended in the purchase, in Mr. NEWBERRY'S behalf, of liquors and cigars, and the testimony was that it was so expended in the city of Detroit alone.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator tell us whether the evidence shows that this particular individual had exclusive charge of that branch of the advertising or whether there were others?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am sorry that I can not answer the Senator from Missouri, but I take it for granted that if they were so interested in advertising by buying liquor they would not have intrusted their whole advertising fund to one agent. It would be fair to presume that other men were engaged in this "legitimate" expenditure of money.

I would like to ask how the Senator from Washington would class the purchase of votes? I would like to have the Senator's attention, and to have him answer under which head he would classify this expenditure.

This is the sworn testimony of Frank P. Bohn:

Frank P. Bohn said he lived at Newberry, in Luce County, Mich., and was a physician and banker. He said that he did not believe that Mr. NEWBERRY had any interest in his town now; he said the family did have at one time. He said that "Paul King came to my office in the spring of 1918 and asked me to manage the Newberry campaign for Luce County, and I agreed." He said: "James F. McGregor first spoke to me about compensation; this was two or three weeks after Paul King's visit. He said that he was there as field secretary, looking after the Upper Peninsula, and Mr. McGregor said he would send up sufficient funds to take care of what I needed. He left no money, but I received a cashier's check on the Commonwealth State Bank of Detroit, and also a draft drawn by the Union Trust Co. on the People's State Bank of New York."

I would like, in passing, to say just this: There is no evidence in this record, except this one man's statement, that they had a campaign fund in a bank in New York. They led us to believe that all their funds were contained in deposits made in two banks in the city of Detroit, and yet they evidently had a fund in a New York bank, because he referred to a draft drawn by the Union Trust Co. on the People's State Bank of New York.

One was for $100 and one for $50. He said: "I expended further $125 for workers distributing literature and getting the vote out. Also had a list of voters in the various townships made, which I used." He said: "I employed about 15 men to work primary day; paid them $5 apiece; two of them $10, who worked before primary day"—

I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Washington—

He said that he paid men who worked before primary day, and the two he paid the $10 to; the names were William J. Campbell and Howard Reynolds. He said: "I told the men to get boys out to distribute literature and do what they could for the interest of Mr. NEWBERRY." He said the draft and check came in August some time. He said he wrote for $50, and that the balance came voluntarily. He said that he did not know who sent the letters. He said: "Mr. McGregor had told me the money would come."

I call attention to this:

He said, I had told Mr. McGregor that it would take $100 to $150 to take care of the work. He said the men selected had worked for him in politics before; that I didn't know who they were supporting before I hired them; my purpose was to get them to support NEWBERRY; simply asked them if they were not tied up to support NEWBERRY. It was my intention to get their support and vote for NEWBERRY. I did not know who they were for for Senator. I had some correspondence with Detroit, and Paul King was there just the once; that James McGregor was there twice, and also a publicity man, I believe Mr. Phillips was the man.

He said he paid 15 men $5 apiece to get their support and vote for NEWBERRY. The Senator from Washington says that none of this money was expended except for advertising and other legitimate purposes. Since buying votes is not advertising, I am forced to the conclusion that the Senator from Washington thinks that buying votes is a legitimate purpose.

These are not isolated cases. The record teems with them. Men by the hundreds were corrupted with money, and with money corrupted the election. If such expenditures can be classified as either advertising or other legitimate expenses, I ask the apologists who voted for Senator NEWBERRY to tell us under which head to classify them.

In the same paragraph the statement is made that—

The incentive, no doubt, which influenced the Republicans in this effort was to offset the tremendous publicity carried on at perhaps ten times the expense of the Republican campaign by Mr. Ford through his various business agencies.

The Senator from Washington knows that a very large part of these expenses were incurred by Mr. NEWBERRY and the foundation laid for the others, not by Republicans of Michigan but by Mr. NEWBERRY and his family, long before Ford became a candidate and long before his name ever appeared in any of the numerous letters that passed between Mr. NEWBERRY and his campaign agencies, and therefore long before Mr. Ford was ever suspected of being a candidate. They were incurred to defeat Gov. Osborn, a staunch Republican and a man who would not buy an office. They were incurred to defeat ex-Gov. Warner, three times elected the chief executive of Michigan, and several other prominent Michiganders who were thought to be candidates, including the then sitting Senator, William Alden Smith.

I have a clipping from the RECORD here, but I do not see it just this minute, and I ask permission to insert a quotation from a letter of Senator NEWBERRY himself urging King to keep up "our publicity campaign," because Warner was already scared out, and it would keep others out. I shall insert that, with the reference to the record.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am glad Mr. Warner is scared out for the present and as long as we keep up our publicity work at full pressure it will be harder and harder for any new man to get any kind of a start that will make it seem worth while for him to be a serious candidate.

Again, the Senator from Washington knows the evidence discloses that Henry Ford never spent one dollar in his campaign for the Senate, and, as far as this record shows, and as far as the Senator from Washington or anyone else knows, no one else spent any money in his behalf. Even the attorneys for Mr. NEWBERRY abandoned the contention before the Committee on Privileges and Elections that any money had been spent by Mr. Ford or his friends in the race.

Oh, then, the charge is made that Mr. Ford "was a pacifist, had opposed the effort to bring the war to a victorious conclusion, was in favor of a compromise peace, and who had secured the military exemption of his son."

The Senator so kindly says that he "only mentions these circumstances to show the conditions under which the campaign was carried on."

I will here insert the military records of Henry Ford and his son and that of Senator NEWBERRY, and do so without comment.

Henry Ford hoped that we would stay out of the war. And so far as his record discloses, I think he could be classed as a pacifist.

Before we entered the war, but after the President had issued his call for the meeting in April, 1917, of the extraordinary session of Congress and in anticipation of war, Mr. Ford came to Washington and offered to his Government every resource of the Ford industrial plant, which the Senator from Washington says was the greatest in the world. Mr. Ford stated that he was opposed to war, but since war was to come, he wanted to help make it a war to end wars, and, therefore, gave every resource he had to his Government to help wage this contest. After the war commenced his son, Edsel Ford, was offered a commission in the Army and told then that he would be detailed to help manage the great Ford plants, which were to turn out Government supplies. He declined this. He stated that if he was to wear a uniform, he wanted to go to war as other boys went and serve in the trenches, but that if he was to be detailed to serve at home, he would serve as a civilian, and did.

When Mr. Ford made his contracts with the Navy Department, like the contracts that were being made with other people, on a cost plus 10 per cent plan—that is, 10 per cent profit on his contract—he then stated to the Secretary of the Navy that he would turn back 58 per cent of the profits, that being the amount of stock he held at that time in the Ford plants. However, before the contracts were completed, Ford had bought out the minority stockholders, and did, as a matter of fact, give back to the Government every penny that he made on those contracts. He had other contracts with the Government, and he turned back every dollar that he made above cost of manufacture and experimental costs to carry on the work. So Henry Ford did not profit one penny out of the Government from war contracts, though at the close of the war every wheel in his factories and every lathe was turning out munitions and equipments of some kind or another for the Government to use in the war. As a single instance, the Government was paying $18 for every cylinder made to use in the Liberty motor. Mr. Ford invented a new process of making them, and let the Government have them at $8.25 each.

Senator NEWBERRY's military record was published in the Washington Daily News of a few weeks ago. I insert it as it appeared:

NEWBERRY'S WAR RECORD.

The NEWBERRY defense emphasizes his "patriotic war services."

An official report in the files of the Navy Department, prepared by Maj. John C. Muir, United States Marine Corps, discloses:

1. That NEWBERRY, lieutenant commander in the Naval Reserves and chief personnel officer of the third naval district (New York), was directly responsible for conditions of enlistment and enrollment in that district.

2. That NEWBERRY's office, at 280 Broadway, was the medium through which rich men's sons obtained safe and easy berths.

3. That one of NEWBERRY's immediate subordinates, Lieut. B. J. Elbert, confessed that he had been instrumental in placing many men in safe, easy berths, and had accepted bribes ranging from $100 to $3,000 for such services.

4. That Frederick Cody, of New York, a "friend for many years"—NEWBERRY's language—and business associate of NEWBERRY, on various occasions introduced people who "were subsequently enrolled under peculiar and suspicious circumstances." The record in the Newberry case discloses that Cody, lobbyist for Standard Oil, the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and the American Book Co., was one of the active directors of the Newberry campaign in Michigan. A brief filed on behalf of NEWBERRY states that Cody, on account of personal favors, frequently acted as "messenger boy" for NEWBERRY.

5. That NEWBERRY denied by letter that Cody was an "intimate friend" and stated, "Mr. Cody did not represent me and has never represented me at any time or at any place."

6. That conditions with regard to securing bombproof jobs for rich men's sons at NEWBERRY's office, 280 Broadway, were so flagrant that they became the subject of vaudeville jokes.

7. That a large number of persons paid money for preference in enrollment, detail and rating, and that the greater portion of the amounts involved were received by an officer under immediate command of NEWBERRY.

8. That in July, 1918, Rear Admiral Usher, commander of the third naval district, said he would take the matter up with the personnel officer [NEWBERRY]. That a short time afterwards Usher told Lieut. Commander Frost, his aide, that the matter had been taken up by him with NEWBERRY, who informed him that he felt the rumors were groundless, but had warned Lieut. Elbert. That nevertheless the sale of easy berths continued.

9. That NEWBERRY, after his election to the Senate, refused to appear before the naval board of inquiry in New York, taking refuge in his senatorial immunity, and that Maj. Muir thereupon reported that "as Lieut. Commander NEWBERRY [Senator NEWBERRY] is not available for interview, it is impracticable for me to go further in this phase of the case."

Let me add further, the evidence shows that Mr. Templeton, the so-styled chairman of the general committee of the Newberry campaign committee, and Mr. NEWBERRY were the largest stockholders in a corporation that had large contracts with the Government to manufacture war materials, and it is to be presumed they made large profits. Neither Mr. NEWBERRY nor Mr. Templeton, so far as the Senate has been informed, or the public, for that matter, turned back a penny of their profits to the Government, but kept them, and Mr. NEWBERRY invested his, it would seem, in a seat in this Senate, the purchase of which the Senator from Washington voted to ratify.

As to NEWBERRY's sons' and brothers' military record, I shall make no comment. I leave to the bad taste of those on the other side to strike at a father over the shoulder of his son. I venture the assertion, however, in passing, that Edsel Ford rendered as valuable services to his country during the war as did any of the Newberry name. Whatever consolation the friends and supporters of Mr. NEWBERRY may get in the comparison of the records of Mr. Ford and Mr. NEWBERRY, I leave for them to determine.

In passing, it is suggested Senator NEWBERRY holds the world's record for refusing to testify when his own good name and his own honor were at stake. He refused to testify when he was indicted and arraigned before a court of his own State charged with crime. He refused to testify when a senatorial committee was conducting an investigation to determine whether he had been guilty of acts which rendered him unworthy to serve as a Member of this Senate. He refused to testify when a naval inquiry was being attempted to be conducted to determine who was responsible for the selling of assignments to berths of safety in the Navy, the sales having taken place within the bureau of which he was the immediate chief. I would like the Senator from Washington to explain this strange reluctance when he next writes for publicity to his constituent.

The Senator from Washington says the result "vindicated" Mr. NEWBERRY. I am curious to know what constitutes vindication in the eyes of a Republican when another Republican has been charged with election frauds. Mr. NEWBERRY was scratched, as I am informed, by nearly 150,000 Republicans in his State at the general election, when not, as here claimed, all of the facts were known, because none of these investigations had been had then, and it would require a daring soul to contend that had these records been known, that Mr. NEWBERRY would have been elected at all. And this in face of the fact that the most vindictive campaign ever waged in this country was waged against Mr. Ford in that contest.

Again says the Senator in his letter:

It is not charged that NEWBERRY was guilty of any misconduct.

If the Senator can say that in the face of the record of 2,000 pages of charges, I think it needs no response.

Senator POINDEXTER then charges that Senator NEWBERRY—was prosecuted with great venom by the Democratic administration, which backed Ford, and the powerful machinery of the Government, with its myriad of secret service agents, and with its machinery of district attorneys and marshals, was ordered to the task of securing evidence against NEWBERRY and sending him to prison.

He also says that this was—backed up by the influence of Henry Ford, controlling and owning one of the most powerful and wealthy industrial organizations in the world.

Permit me to say that there is not a line of evidence in the record that the Democratic administration took any part in the primary election in Michigan in which these expenditures were charged, or that the administration took any part except through the ordinary machinery of justice in bringing Mr. NEWBERRY to trial. In fact, the investigation was urged not by Democrats but by Republicans, and the record discloses it. There is not a line of evidence that Henry Ford, directly or indirectly, or his organization, directly or indirectly, had any part or parcel in the prosecution of the case against NEWBERRY and his codefendants. I challenge the Senator to show one line of proof to sustain that charge.

There were letters from Mr. Osborn, there was a letter from the lieutenant governor, calling attention to the situation, and the charges against Mr. NEWBERRY were made then, as later, not by Democrats but by Republicans and Republican officeholders of Michigan.

I want to read just one line of the letter that Mr. NEWBERRY wrote this confidential agent, Mr. King, in explaining his letter which he had written in answer to Mr. Vandenberg. He said:

I am inclosing a copy of my noncommittal letter to the Grand Rapids people, which covers the situation in a rather flimsy manner.

Noncommittal, indeed! Flimsy!

On August 8, 1918, nearly three weeks before the primary election, Mr. Vandenberg, of the Grand Rapids Herald, wrote Mr. NEWBERRY that—

DEAR SIR: I desire to direct your attention to certain phases of the Michigan Republican senatorial campaign which seem to demand very clear and explicit public statement from you well in advance of primary election day. * * *

I direct your attention to these specific charges which have appeared in responsible newspapers. They are charges, furthermore, which find kinship in very general rumor and report. I fully realize that gossip is deadly and a ruthless assassin. But gossip, in this instance, is too widespread to be longer ignored. It charges you and your associates with the expenditure of money running into six figures in the erection of your senatorial organization. Such a situation must be as intolerable for you, if these reports are false, as it is intolerable for the State if the reports are true. Therefore, it is a situation which must be challenged, because if not challenged by you it will have to be challenged by the electorate. * * *

While this letter is purely personal to you, I should be glad to have an answer from you which could be published simultaneously with this letter so that the issue may be made clear.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Further replying to what I conceive to be a rather inaccurate statement of the Senator from Washington, if I understand his letter, it appears that Mr. NEWBERRY was indicted and was tried by a grand jury, the majority of whom were Republicans, and tried by a petit jury, a majority of whom were Republicans——

Mr. CARAWAY. Eleven of them, I understand.

Mr. KING. And by a Republican judge, and the evidence before the court was not nearly so strong as that which was before the Senate committee, but it was sufficient to warrant the submission of it to the jury, and not only to warrant it but demanded on that proof the conviction of Mr. NEWBERRY and his associates. How it can be charged that it was a Democratic prosecution is something I can not conceive.

Mr. CARAWAY. I can conceive how it can be charged, but I know it can not be proved to have been true.

Mr. KING. It can not be charged in fairness.

Mr. CARAWAY. Not in good faith.

I challenge the Senator from Washington now to show that Henry Ford was instrumental or had anything to do with the conviction of Mr. NEWBERRY in Michigan. In this paragraph it will also be observed that the Senator says:

The Supreme Court completely vindicated Senator NEWBERRY of any offense.

That is the exact language of the Senator from Washington.

The Supreme Court made no such finding. Every man, lawyer or layman, who read the opinion of that court in that case knows that the Supreme Court held the act under which NEWBERRY was prosecuted unconstitutional. The question of his guilt or innocence was not determined by the Supreme Court, and no expression in relation thereto was made by the court, because the facts were not inquired into, but simply the act was determined to be unconstitutional. But, in spite of this, the Senator adds:

But, in addition to that, they went into the merits of the case and held that he had not received a fair trial and that he was not guilty of any misconduct.

That is the exact language of the Senator from Washington.

Again, everyone conversant with the case knows—and let me repeat it—that the Supreme Court held no such thing. It did not pass upon that question at all. It expressed no opinion as to his guilt or innocence, and the Senator from Washington surely never read this opinion, or he could not make such an assertion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator could with propriety there state that the Supreme Court did not pretend to pass upon the validity of the State statute; indeed, they have no authority to do so. No one challenges the validity of the State statute, and no one can read the evidence and say that Mr. NEWBERRY and others did not violate the State statute.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am going to be entirely charitable to the Senator from Washington. I do not think he read the evidence, and I know he did not read the opinion of the Supreme Court, because he would not have made that assertion if he had read it.

In the next paragraph appears the statement by the Senator that—the Senate, following the Supreme Court of the United States, exonerated him—from blame and declared his election to the Senate valid.

Meaning NEWBERRY—

The Senate did not follow the Supreme Court and did not find Senator NEWBERRY without blame, because the Senator from Washington himself voted for a resolution, as follows:

Resolved, (1) That the contest of Henry Ford against TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY be, and it is hereby, dismissed.

(2) That TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1919, and is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States.

(3) That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.

The expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

In this resolution the Senate found that Mr. NEWBERRY and his friends were guilty of conduct hurtful to sound public policy and injurious to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and were guilty of acts which endangered the perpetuity of free government itself, but added that in order to retain a Republican Member of the Senate it condoned these offenses and said to Senator NEWBERRY: "The method you employed to secure your seat was against public policy and hurtful to the honor of this body, of which you are about to be declared a member, and endangered free institutions; but since you are a Republican and contributed to the Republican campaign fund we welcome you as a brother."

In the next paragraph of Senator POINDEXTER's letter there appears this sentence:

As stated above, there is not a single word of evidence to show that a dollar was improperly spent in the general election.

Mark the Senator's statement that not a dollar had been spent. Here is the sworn statement of the man who for 15 or 20 years had been an election officer in Michigan:

I, John Wagley, Cross Village, being duly sworn, say that I am a resident of Cross Village, county of Emmet, State of Michigan; that my occupation is that of a retired farmer; that I have been advised that the persons to whom I am giving this affidavit, to wit, Walter O. Lewis, Jesse H. Williamson, and Edward S. Ridley, are Government employees and special agents of the Department of Justice; further, that this statement is made by me on my own free will and accord and that no promise or inducement of any kind or character has been made to me in order to obtain this statement and affidavit; that the night before the general election of November 5, 1918, W. S. Darling, of Harbor Springs, Mich., came to me at my home and in the presence of my wife, Anna, told me that he would like to interest me in Mr. NEWBERRY; that I told him that I would not vote for NEWBERRY. And in response Darling said that he had some money for me and showed some paper money in his hand; that on the morning of election day I served as an election inspector at the polls, Darling came to me and again endeavored to interest me in NEWBERRY; he further added, "I would like to get you to assist these Indians in voting." I told Darling that was my duty anyhow, and Darling said that, "if you will do that I will pay you for it"; that for the past 10 or 12 years I have been active at the polls on election day, assisting the Indian voters in order to prevent any of their votes being thrown out and spoiled; that on election day, 1918, quite a number of the Indians came to me and I would say, "Now how do you want to vote?" whereupon they would reach in their pockets and produce one of NEWBERRY'S cards and say, "I want to vote for that man." At the close of the polls on election day Darling again came to me and handed me $10 and told me to put it in my pocket; that there were about 150 votes in my voting district, 100 of which are Indians; further, that Darling has told me that he rented an automobile on election day from Henry Sullivan which he used to bring Indian voters to the polls, and Sullivan has told me that Darling paid him $16 for automobile hire on election day. Charles Warren is reported to have received $50 or $60 for his work around the polls, but Warren told me that he only received $5, and that was from Darling.

JOHN WAGLEY.

If that is not an expenditure of some money in the general election, I am curious to know under just which head it will be classified. And that is not an isolated case; there are numbers of them. And this is not an isolated case. I shall leave to the constituents of Senator POINDEXTER to say, after all the record has been examined, whether this money was improperly spent.

In the same paragraph appears this sentence:

He—

Meaning NEWBERRY—

took no interest in the campaign, but devoted himself to his work in the Navy throughout the campaign, both the primary and the final.

Oh, how can one say that in view of the 2,000 pages of testimony in this case and Senator NEWBERRY'S own admissions on the floor of the Senate? One is tempted to ask, however, what was the work of Mr. NEWBERRY in the Navy? Was it protecting those who, under his immediate command, were selling secure berths to the sons of rich parents?

The next to last paragraph of this wonderful letter reads as follows:

On the contrary, certain multimillionaire organizations, profiting financially by any popular excitement which they can arouse, were seeking by every means in their power to influence and intimidate Senators to vote against NEWBERRY.

That is a charge that somebody was making money out of the Newberry case; that somebody was standing here and trying by intimidation or bribery to secure the rejection of Senator NEWBERRY. I have prepared a resolution which I wish to present—and, of course, I know the Senator from Washington would be glad to have it presented and adopted—providing that the Presiding Officer shall appoint five Senators to inquire into this malign influence.

I want to say frankly that so far as I know, until the Senator from Washington made the declaration, no one had heard of any such influences. It was never indicated. Of course, I think all understand why the charge is now made.

But for the Senator from Washington I have had a very great liking, and for him and those who, like him, find themselves subject to criticism by their constituents for having voted to ratify this purchase of a seat in the Senate by Senator NEWBERRY I think a very wide latitude should be given in explaining the motives that tempted them so to vote. For the Senator himself I peculiarly sympathize, because in this letter he discloses the fact that the news editors in his State had refused, perhaps because they found themselves unable, to accept his version of the Newberry record as correct, and had declined to print his explanation, and therefore he was driven to the use of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in order to try to get before the people of Washington his "version" of what the facts are, as disclosed by the record in the Newberry case. It seems to me that the people of Washington, at least those who have any opportunity to examine the record, will be as averse to accepting as authentic his statements touching the Newberry case as were the newspaper editors reluctant to publish them.

I was under the impression that I had brought over from my office with me the resolution of investigation which I wish to offer. However, I can not put my hand on it at this moment, but I desire to say that on Monday next I shall, immediately after the convening of the Senate, offer the resolution of investigation and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am not surprised at the persistence with which the Senator from Arkansas follows up this question. Unfortunately partisanship seems to have entered into it to a very large extent, and the Senator from Arkansas, while he has the respect of every Senator, is known to be one of the most intense party men and followers of the former President Wilson in the Senate. It would therefore be exceedingly strange and unusual if the Senator from Arkansas, in view of the influences that have been exerted from those sources in this case from the beginning to its end, should lose any of the intensity of his feeling about it or should give any evidences of treating it in an impartial manner or with what I might call a judicial frame of mind.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator. I hope he will not interrupt me long, because I wish to make a very brief statement. I am, however, perfectly willing to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I shall not interrupt the Senator. I think the Senator will need all of his time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the salient points in the letter which the Senator from Arkansas has reread into the RECORD, it having already been published in the RECORD, thereby giving it added emphasis and publicity, for which I am very much obliged to him, can very readily be carried in one's mind. I adverted in that letter to the fact, which I think even the Senator from Arkansas will not deny, that a great many charges have been made—at least, the charge has been repeated often—that Senator NEWBERRY had bought his seat in the Senate. Another form of that statement has been that a seat in the Senate had been bought by some one. The statement made in my letter to the effect that such charges have been repeated throughout the country is correct; but I reassert that the charges are unsubstantiated by any testimony worthy of the consideration of any intelligent man. Neither the Senator from Arkansas nor anybody else has offered any testimony tending to show or making any color of substantiation of the charge that Senator NEWBERRY bought his seat in the Senate. Neither is there any testimony of any substance worthy of serious consideration that anybody bought a seat in the Senate or that any appreciable number of people, if any at all, were corruptly influenced by the use of money in the Michigan election. That is one of the statements which the Senator from Arkansas challenges and which he utterly fails to overthrow by the citation of any evidence, either that which has been given already or by the production of any new evidence relating to the election in Michigan.

Another statement which I made in this letter was that the excessive and improper use of money charged or alleged was said to have been used in the primary election and not in the general election. Nobody can successfully dispute that. I assume that the Senator from Arkansas, with the interest that he has in defending his party and his candidate that were involved in this election, has exhausted his resources and the possibilities of proof in his addresses to the Senate, and especially in the prepared speech which he has delivered here this afternoon, very much to my surprise; yet in that prepared speech the showing which he makes to dispute the statement that there was no illegal or improper use of money either as to the manner in which it was spent or as to the amount expended in the general election is so trivial that it does not deserve any consideration. It never would receive the attention or the consideration of any tribunal, either political or judicial, had it been presented to them and had the case depended upon any such thing as that.

The fact of the matter is that all the Senator from Arkansas has reiterated here this afternoon, being the refined proof after his judicial mind has sifted all the dross and put in concentrated form the evidence that he could produce or that could be produced to invalidate the election of Mr. NEWBERRY, contains nothing whatever to show that the decision which the people of Michigan rendered when this issue, which he has now reiterated here this evening in revised form, was presented to them, did not completely exonerate Senator NEWBERRY from every charge that was made against him, so far as the verdict of the people of that great State could exonerate him.

I take it that in a matter of this kind the decision of the sovereign voters of the State who are to be represented by the Senator from that State as to the issues which are raised against him in the election, which are the same issues that are presented by the Senator from Arkansas here this afternoon, ought to have some weight with the Senate and with the country, because we are presumed here to represent sovereign States, and under the amended form of the Constitution of the United States to represent the people of those States; and the assertion made in this letter that Senator NEWBERRY had been chosen by the people of Michigan in an election in which it is not charged that any corrupt influence was used has not been successfully disputed by the Senator from Arkansas, and can not be.

Far be it from me to set up my judgment in this case against that of any other man. I am responsible only for my own. Many of the great questions which have interested and concerned the people of this country have been questions upon which those who were responsible for their decision had differing opinions. I never have challenged the sincerity or the good faith of any man who formed an opinion contrary to mine, either in this case or in any other case submitted to the vote of the Senate.

Some time ago I received a letter from a constituent who differed with me in regard to this particular matter, pointing out that certain other Senators had taken a different view of it from mine. I replied to him that in a matter which involved my own action I had at least as much confidence in my own judgment as I had in theirs, and that if it came to a question of counting noses and balancing numbers as to who was for and who was against in this issue I would call his attention to the fact that a majority of the Senate of the United States had sustained the election of Mr. NEWBERRY as a valid one, and had confirmed him in his seat in the Senate.

Mr. President, without following the exact order of the various points in my letter to which the Senator from Arkansas has referred, I may call attention to a good many misstatements which he has made in regard to the letter which he had lying before him, and which he had just read to the Senate, from which I infer that if he is as fallible in his statement of a fact so recent as was that in his mind we may doubt exceedingly his recollection and the accuracy of his statements in regard to matters involved in this election which occurred so long ago.

The Senator states that the letter to which he has referred contained the statement by me that I had been unable to get my views in regard to this case published in the State or received by the editors of newspapers, and that consequently I was obliged to rely upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to get them published. I think the stenographic notes will corroborate me in that quotation from the remarks just made by the Senator from Arkansas. Without any invidious abruptness, I beg leave to say that it is absolutely incorrect and that no such statement was contained in my letter, nor anything resembling it. I never have had any trouble in getting my views in this case published in any newspaper to which I cared to send them. I did make some remark to my correspondent in this particular case to the effect that I doubted very much whether a hostile editor would print a letter of mine on this subject with the same conspicuousness in his paper as he did his own editorials; but that is a very different thing from what the Senator from Arkansas has distorted my statement into.

So, Mr. President, as to the concluding remark of the Senator, in which he cites this allegation which I made:

> Various false assertions have been made as to influences brought to bear to secure votes in NEWBERRY's behalf in the Senate. I notice a detailed statement in that connection published in several Washington State papers as to my own vote. This statement is libelous and false from beginning to end, as no such influences were brought to bear and no such statements, or anything resembling them or anything to that effect, were made to me.

I did not state in the letter what the details of the matter to which I referred consisted of, but I am perfectly willing to do so at any time that anybody is interested in them. I am always loath to take up the time of the Senate in talking about personal matters and going into the details of conversations which are not supposed, at least, to be of paramount interest to anyone except those whom they immediately concern. I do not know what the Senator from Arkansas intends to make out of that, but I am perfectly ready to inform him or anyone else as to what particulars they referred to—certain conversations that people were alleged to have had with me about the vote in the Newberry case that were published in certain hostile papers in my State—reports coming from this Capitol, which, as stated in this letter, were libelous and false from beginning to end, in that no such conversations or anything like them ever took place, and no such advice in an attempt to influence my vote was ever given to me. The Senator from Arkansas can make what he chooses out of that.

So, with the statement:

> On the contrary, certain multimillionaire organizations, profiting financially by any popular excitement which they can arouse, were seeking by every means in their power to influence and intimidate Senators to vote against NEWBERRY. This may be referred to in more detail later on.

The Senator says he is going to introduce on Monday a resolution to inquire about that. I have not the slightest objection to a resolution to inquire about it. All that I have to say about it could be said in five minutes, and said in such a way that I am perfectly confident that it will not be disputed by anybody who is familiar with the circumstances. That statement was made in answer to the charges with which every Senator on this floor is familiar, which went around the country from gossips and from suspicious minds, as to influences which were brought to bear to secure votes, to whip votes into line for Senator NEWBERRY, published in various newspapers in the country. No such influences were brought to bear upon me; but, on the contrary, if the Senator's resolution is adopted and if the great Senate of the United States wants to turn aside from the important national issues which ought to secure its constant attention and go into that matter, I will present to the Senator from Arkansas in printed form editorials of a most insolent character, published long before the vote in the Senate was had upon the Newberry case, arrogating to themselves the authority to tell Senators here how they should vote upon that case—editorials appearing in papers which belonged to a great multimillionaire organization, to quote the language of this letter, "profiting financially by any popular excitement which they can arouse."

Does the Senate want to inquire into that? Does the Senator from Arkansas want information on that subject? It ought to be known to him already. If not, I can inform him about it in a very short space of time, and furnish him with the evidence.

> Seeking by every means in their power to influence and intimidate Senators to vote against NEWBERRY—

Because they pretended to hold in their hands control of the votes to determine their continuance in their seat in this body. It is known to thousands, perhaps to millions. At the present time, aside from the question involved in the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas as to the Newberry case, I do not care to go into a discussion of these influences, as to their position in the community, their attitude about the Government and about public men, and their constant effort to make it appear that they are the friends of the downtrodden poor, while as a matter of fact they themselves are among the greatest financial corporations in the United States, profiting by every influence that can be brought to bear in favor of wealth and of power of the kind which they exercise, and attempting to use them in order to influence the vote of Senators here.

Mr. President, the Senator repeated time and time again the statement which he quoted from my letter that Senator NEWBERRY paid but little attention to the campaign, as though a great deal could be made out of challenging that statement. I do not mean to say that he paid no attention at all to it.

My letter said that he paid but little attention to the campaign. To go back of the evidence in this case, I recollect some contact with the situation generally in the senatorial election of 1918 as a member of the senatorial committee. At that time various efforts were made from the headquarters of the committee here to find out what the situation was in the different States; and I have a very distinct recollection of the inquiries which were made of Senator NEWBERRY as to what his prospects were in the campaign, what he was going to do about his election, and of the result that the senatorial committee which was especially charged with an interest in the election of Republican Senators could get no satisfaction at all from him, and could get no resonse from him to amount to anything.

He refused to leave the post to which he was ordered in New York, or to take any active part in his campaign, and all the evidence which has been brought to bear and focused upon this case, in the prosecution of NEWBERRY and various others since that time, has not in any way tended to disprove or dispute that general situation.

Senator NEWBERRY testified here upon the floor that he was not in Michigan an hour during either the primary or the final election. Some reference has been made to the fact that he was kept informed. I suppose reports were made to him, and yet, notwithstanding that, I repeat that he paid but little attention to the campaign, and there is no substantial evidence to show anything to the contrary.

Reference has been made to the statement in this letter that the Republicans of Michigan raised the money for this campaign. The Senator from Arkansas says that is not so, because most of it was raised by relatives of NEWBERRY. That may be true. All of it was not raised by them. We can not escape from the well-known condition which existed in that campaign, that Mr. Ford was the candidate of the Democratic administration; that he was a candidate upon the Democratic ticket, also upon the Republican ticket; that Mr. NEWBERRY was a candidate of those who believed in the prosecution of the war to a victorious conclusion; that Mr. Ford was a candidate of those who believed in a compromise peace. Senator NEWBERRY was the candidate of those whose sons went to war. Mr. Ford was the candidate of those who kept their sons out of the war.

It can not be denied that the Republicans of Michigan made a special effort and had a special appeal made to them to exert themselves to meet the tremendous influence and the tremendous publicity and power which were at the command of a national administration, and of the tremendous industrial organization which was under control of Mr. Ford.

The Senator from Arkansas says there is no evidence that Mr. Ford expended any money in this campaign. There is a great deal of evidence that he expended money in the campaign. I have had evidence given me that every agent handling the Ford automobile, in every town and hamlet in the State of Michigan, was busily engaged working for him.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator never put that in the RECORD for anybody else to see it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; a great deal has never been put in the RECORD. I was never called before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, never had any part whatever in the proceedings. Yet the Senator from Arkansas no doubt knows that the statement I have just made is true. The Senator knows that Mr. Ford had perhaps the greatest publicity organization in the country at that time and that it was engaged in furthering his candidacy in this election.

There is no doubt whatever that the expenses of that organization during that campaign, the advertising of Mr. Ford, the bringing of Mr. Ford's name before the people of Michigan and to the people of the country, amounted to many times the amount that was expended by the Republicans of Michigan in behalf of Mr. NEWBERRY.

The Senator challenges the statement that the money which was raised in behalf of the Republican candidate was expended for legitimate purposes. If it was expended for illegitimate purposes, how does it happen that with all of the venom which has been displayed by the leaders of the Democratic Party on the floor here and in the prosecution of this case in the courts and before the Senate none of these men have been punished under the law for the illegitimate use of money? If the power which was brought to bear in this prosecution to put these men behind the bars could not succeed in doing it I think it is very good evidence that they did not violate the law.

So, if you read the testimony in the case, you will find that with all the labor of these great organizations and this great party to get evidence to show the corrupt use of money, it is centered and brought to a final consummation in the statement of the Senator from Arkansas this evening, that one man got $600, and that he spent part of it in buying liquor and cigars for his friends. That is the end of the Newberry case, so far as the corrupt use of money is concerned, I assume, for that is the most I ever heard of it. That is the most the Senator from Arkansas has been able to show, that a man got some money to take out buttons and take out literature, and that the testimony is that he bought some liquor and cigars for his friends. I do not approve of that; yet, if it is illegal under the laws of Michigan, I assume that the Senator from Arkansas and the others who are so much interested in the prosecution of this case would have had them arrested and punished. I can not assume that the expenditure of $600 had a great deal to do with convincing the public opinion of the State of Michigan, a State with more than three and a half million inhabitants.

I think there was one other item mentioned by the Senator from Arkansas. He said that one man, Mr. Frank T. Bohn, received $150 for looking after the Upper Peninsula, and that he spent that money in hiring men to work. Is that contrary to the law? I would like to see a law against it, and see the law enforced; but that is a very pitiable result of the months of debate in this case, of the tremendous efforts which have been made to show corruption of the election, that a man got $150 and that upon his own motion he used it to hire a few men to go out and work for Mr. NEWBERRY.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not imagine the Senator from Arkansas intended to review all the testimony upon the corrupt use of money in the election, but if the Senator from Washington assumes that that is the case, I am prepared to show that he is quite in error. I myself reviewed the testimony, showing, as I think, corrupt use of money in many other instances than those referred to in this brief discussion by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will permit me, I simply want to say that these were not isolated cases; they were picked out as merely typical cases.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I assume they were the most heinous offenses. I suppose the Senator picked out the worst ones. Are there some worse than the ones he picked out?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes; there are worse ones than that, and it would take but a brief time to bring them to the attention of the Senator. The Senator ought to have known about them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think there was a case the Senator mentioned where some money was handed to a man in an envelope, but no evidence of what it was to be used for. That is probably the one to which he referred.

Mr. CARAWAY. If I may be permitted, I think the most reprehensible thing in this record was where the ex-mayor of Flint, tried and convicted and under a sentence of from 2 to 15 years in the penitentiary for assault and robbery, was approached by King and Fletcher, the latter of whom was a State official of Michigan, and two other men, and when he told them that he was not for NEWBERRY they said he had to support NEWBERRY or go to jail. They said, "We will not ask you whether you will or not, but we know you can carry this district, and if you do, it is all right with you; but if you do not, you go to jail." I do not say that they could control the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan, for I do not know, but the court did reverse the case after TRUMAN NEWBERRY carried the district. But if those men could not do it, they went there and lied to this man who was under sentence, told him they could do it, and got his support for NEWBERRY under the belief that they could. It is all the more reprehensible if State officials, representing themselves to be in a position to influence a decision of the supreme court, and with the power to send a man to jail or release him, were just lying. Let us say that they could not influence the court, and I rather think they could not, and I never said I thought they could; but they made this man, who was under a sentence of from 2 to 15 years, believe it, and if they knew they could not, they were just common liars, trying to deprive him of his right to decide who should be the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas says he is curious to know in what way Senator NEWBERRY has been vindicated. He has been tried by the people of Michigan, and they elected him to the Senate on all of the issues presented here, as I said before. He was prosecuted in the court, and he was acquitted by the highest court in the land. The proceedings which were brought against him were held to be invalid, and I want to read a short extract from the decision of the court, and also from the opinions of some of the concurring judges, in order that it may be in the RECORD.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator a question before he commences to read that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator call the opinion of a judge merely setting out his views a decision of the court?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I do not call the decision of one judge the decision of a court.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the court decide anything except that the act of Congress undertaking to limit expenditures in primary elections was unconstitutional?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There was only one judge——

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the court decide more than that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; that was all they decided.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why did the Senator say, then, that the court went further and found that he was innocent?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The court did go further.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the court find anything other than that the act was unconstitutional?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The court made only that decision, so far as the judgment of the court was concerned; but in the opinion of the judges, including that of the majority of the court, they discussed the general merits of the situation, and if the Senator will give me an opportunity, I will read to him what the court said.

In the opinion rendered by Mr. Justice McReynolds, he said, reading from page 11 of his opinion:

> Who should participate in the specified elections was clearly indicated—members of State legislatures and those having—
>
> "The qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

Who should be eligible for election was also stated:

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

"No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the age of 30 years and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."

Two Senators were allotted to each State, and the method was prescribed for determining the number of Representatives. Subject to these important limitations, Congress was empowered by law to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding the elections, except as to the places of choosing Senators. "These words are used without any veiled or obscure significance" but in their natural and usual sense.

If it be practically true that under present conditions a designated party candidate is necessary for an election—a preliminary thereto—nevertheless his selection is in no real sense part of the manner of holding the election. This does not depend upon the scheme by which candidates are put forward. Whether the candidate be offered through primary, or convention, or petition, or request of a few, or as the result of his own unsupported ambition does not directly affect the manner of holding the election. Birth must precede, but it is no part of either funeral or apotheosis.

Many things are prerequisites to elections or may affect their outcome—voters, education, means of transportation, health, public discussion, immigration, private animosities, even the face and figure of the candidate; but authority to regulate the manner of holding them gives no right to control any of these. It is settled, e. g., that the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce does not reach whatever is essential thereto. Without agriculture, manufacture, mining, etc., commerce could not exist, but this fact does not suffice to subject them to the control of Congress. (Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S., 1.)

Election of Senators by State legislatures presupposed selection of their members by the people; but it would hardly be argued that therefore Congress could regulate such selection. In the Constitutional Convention of 1787, when replying to the suggestion that State legislatures should have uncontrolled power over elections of Members of Congress, Mr. Madison said:

"It seems as improper in principle, though it might be less inconvenient in practice, to give to the State legislatures this great authority over the election of the Representatives of the people in the General Legislature as it would be to give to the latter a like power over the election of their representatives in the State legislatures." (Supplement to Elliot's Debates, Vol. V, p. 402.)

We can not conclude that authority to control party primaries or conventions for designating candidates was bestowed on Congress by the grant of power to regulate the manner of holding elections. The fair intendment of the words does not extend so far; the framers of the Constitution did not ascribe to them any such meaning. Nor is this control necessary in order to effectuate the power expressly granted. On the other hand, its exercise would interfere with purely domestic affairs of the State and infringe upon liberties reserved to the people.

It should not be forgotten that, exercising inherent police power, the State may suppress whatever evils may be incident to primary or convention. As "each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own Members," and as Congress may by law regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections, the National Government is not without power to protect itself against corruption, fraud, or other malign influences.

The judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Reversed.

Mr. Justice McKenna concurs in this opinion as applied to the statute under consideration, which was enacted prior to the seventeenth amendment; but he reserves the question of the power of Congress under that amendment.

Only one other justice of the court concurred in the opinion, although the entire court concurred in the result. Mr. Chief Justice White, concurring in the result and thereby taking part in the decision and action of the court, gave his reasons as entering into the ultimate decision, which included what I have read, and also included the additional views of the Chief Justice, as follows:

Having thus fixed the meaning of the prohibitions of the statute, the court came to apply them as thus defined to the particular case before it, saying:

"(c) To apply these rules to this case: If you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant, TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY, at or about the time that he became a candidate for United States Senator, was informed and knew that his campaign for the nomination and election would require the expenditure and use of more money than is permitted by law and with such knowledge became a candidate, and thereafter, by advice, by conduct, by his acts, by his direction, by his counsel, or by his procurement he actively participated and took part in the expenditure and use of an excessive sum of money, of an unlawful sum of money, you would be warranted in finding that he did violate this statute, known as the corrupt practices act."

Mr. Chief Justice White proceeds after that statement, in dealing with the instructions of the lower court, with the question of whether or not, therefore, a fair trial was had by the defendant, as follows:

Whether the instructions marked (a) and (b), if unexplained, were, in view of the ambiguity lurking in many of the expressions used therein, prejudicially erroneous, I do not think necessary to consider, since I see no escape from the conclusion that the instruction marked (c), which made application of the view of the statute stated in the previous passages (a) and (b), were in clear conflict with the text of the statute and were necessarily of a seriously prejudicial nature, since in substance they announced the doctrine that, under the statute, although a candidate for the office of Senator might not have contributed a cent to the campaign or caused others to do so, he nevertheless was guilty if he became a candidate or continued as such after acquiring knowledge that more than $3,750 had been contributed and was being expended in the campaign. The error in the instruction plainly resulted from a failure to distinguish between the subject with which the statute dealt—contributions and expenditures made or caused to be made by the candidate—and campaign contributions and expenditures not so made or caused to be made, and therefore not within the statute.

Without reading all of the remarks of the Chief Justice, I call attention to this language:

Under the instruction given, in every case where to the knowledge of the candidate a sum in excess of the amount limited by the statute was contributed by citizens to the campaign, the candidate, if he failed to withdraw, would be subject to criminal prosecution and punishment. So, also, contributions by citizens to the expenses of the campaign, if only knowledge could be brought home to them that the aggregate of such contributions would exceed the limit of the statute, would bring them, as illustrated by this case, within the conspiracy statute and accordingly subject to prosecution. Under this view the greater the public service and the higher the character of the candidate, giving rise to a correspondingly complete and self-sacrificing support by the electorate to his candidacy, the more inevitably would criminality and infamous punishment result both to the candidate and to the citizen who contributed.

I ask leave to print in connection with my remarks a number of extracts from the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Pitney.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

Since the majority of the court hold that the act is invalid, it would serve no useful purpose to spend time in discussing those assignments of error that relate to the conduct of the trial. It may be said, however, that, in my opinion, the trial court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendants for want of evidence of the alleged conspiracy; nor in instructing the jury that the prohibition of the statute against the expenditure and use of money by a candidate beyond the specified limit is not confined to his own money, but extends to the expenditure or use of excessive sums of money by him, from whatever source and from whomsoever derived; nor in instructing them that in order to warrant a verdict of guilty upon an indictment for conspiracy it was not necessary that the Government should show that defendants knew that some statute forbade the acts they were contemplating, but only to show an agreement to do acts constituting a violation of the statute; their knowledge of the law being presumed.

I find prejudicial error, however, in that part of the charge which assumed to define the extent to which a candidate must participate in expenditures beyond the amount limited in order that he may be held to have violated the prohibition—an instruction vitally important because it was largely upon overt acts supposed to have been done in carrying out the alleged conspiracy that the Government relied to prove the making of the conspiracy and its character, and because, unless the purposes of defendants involved a violation of the corrupt practices act, they were not guilty of a conspiracy to commit an "offense against the United States" within the meaning of section 37, Criminal Code.

The instruction upon this topic, excepted to and assigned for error, was as follows: "The phrase which constitutes the prohibition against the candidate 'Causing to be given, contributed, expended or used' excessive sums of money, is not limited and not confined to expenditures and use of money made directly and personally by himself. This prohibition extends to the expenditure and use of excessive sums of money in which the candidate actively participates, or assists, or advises, or directs, or induces, or procures. The prohibition extends not only to the expenditure and use of excessive sums of money by the candidate directly and personally but to such use and expenditure through his agency, or procurement, or assistance. To constitute a violation of this statute knowledge of the expenditure and use of excessive sums of money on the part of the candidate is not sufficient; neither is it sufficient to constitute a violation of this statute that the candidate merely acquiesces in such expenditures and use. But it is sufficient to constitute a violation of this statute if the candidate actively participates in doing the things which occasion such expenditures and use of money and so actively participates with knowledge that the money is being expended and used. To apply these rules to this case: If you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant, TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY, at or about the time that he became a candidate for United States Senator was informed and knew that his campaign for the nomination and election would require the expenditure and use of more money than is permitted by law and with such knowledge became a candidate, and thereafter by advice, by conduct, by his acts, by his direction, by his counsel, or by his procurement he actively participated and took part in the expenditure and use of an excessive sum of money, of an unlawful sum of money, you will be warranted in finding that he did violate this statute known as the corrupt practices act."

However this may be regarded when considered in the abstract, the difficulty with it, when viewed in connection with the evidence in the case to which the jury was called upon to apply it, is that it permitted and perhaps encouraged the jury to find the defendants guilty of a conspiracy to violate the corrupt practices act if they merely contemplated a campaign requiring the expenditure of money beyond the statutory limit, even though Mr. NEWBERRY, the candidate, had not, and it was not contemplated that he should have, any part in causing or procuring such expenditure beyond his mere standing voluntarily as a candidate and participating in the campaign with knowledge that moneys contributed and expended by others without his participation were to be expended.

The language of the corrupt practices act (37 Stat., 28) is: "No candidate * * * shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised," etc. A reading of the entire act makes it plain that Congress did not intend to limit spontaneous contributions of money by others than a candidate, nor expenditures of such money except as he should participate therein. Of course, it does not mean that he must be alone in expending or causing to be expended the excessive sums of money; if he does it through an agent or agents, or through associates who stand in the position of agents, no doubt he is guilty; qui facit per alium facit per se; but unless he is an offender as a principal there is no offense. Section 332, Criminal Code, declares: "Whoever directly commits any act constituting an offense defined in any law of the United States, or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, or procures its commission, is a principal." Clearly this makes anyone who abets a candidate in expending or causing to be expended excessive sums a principal offender; but it can not change the definition of the offense itself as contained in the corrupt practices act, so as to make a candidate a principal offender unless he directly commits the offense denounced. Spontaneous expenditures by others being without the scope of the prohibition, neither he nor anybody else can be held criminally responsible for merely abetting such expenditures.

It follows that one's entry upon a candidacy for nomination and election as a Senator with knowledge that such candidacy will come to naught unless supported by expenditure of money beyond the specified limit, is not within the inhibition of the act unless it is contemplated that the candidate shall have a part in procuring the excessive expenditures beyond the effect of his mere candidacy in evoking spontaneous contributions and expenditures by his supporters; and that his remaining in the field and participating in the ordinary activitives of the campaign with knowledge that such activities furnish in a general sense the "occasion" for the expenditure is not to be regarded as a "causing" by the candidate of such expenditure within the meaning of the statute.

The state of the evidence made it important that, in connection with that portion of the charge above quoted the jury should be cautioned that unless it was a part of defendants' plan that Mr. NEWBERRY should actually participate in giving, contributing, expending, using, or promising, or causing to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised moneys in excess of the limited amount—either himself or through others as his agents—his mere participation in the activities of the campaign, even with knowledge that moneys spontaneously contributed and expended by others, without his agency, procurement, or assistance, were to be or were being expended, would not of itself amount to his causing such excessive expenditure. The effect of the instruction that was given may well have been to convey to the jury the view that Mr. NEWBERRY's conduct in becoming and remaining a candidate with knowledge that spontaneous contributions and expenditures of money by his supporters would exceed the statutory limit, and his active participation in the campaign, were necessarily equivalent to an active participation by him in causing the expenditure and use of an excessive sum of money and that a combination among defendants having for its object Mr. NEWBERRY's participation in a campaign where money in excess of the prescribed limit was to be expended, even without his participation in the contribution or expenditure of such money, amounted to a conspiracy on their part to commit an offense against the act.

For error in the instructions in this particular the judgment should be reversed, with directions for a new trial.

Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Clarke concur in this opinion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In conclusion, I desire to reiterate, in support of the statement which has been challenged by the Senator from Arkansas, that Mr. NEWBERRY has been vindicated by the people of Michigan; he has been vindicated of any offense by the Supreme Court of the United States, and in speaking in regard to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States I am speaking only of the issues which were involved in the case which were submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States; that he was held not guilty of the violation of any law in effect—that was the effect of the decision. He was discharged by the highest judicial authority in the land from the prosecution which was brought against him. Then, again, for the third time, he was vindicated, if any action of human authority can be held capable of vindicating a man whose conduct is challenged, by the Senate of the United States, after a most thorough and exhaustive discussion, prosecuted with the greatest zeal by people who have the deepest political and personal interest, apparently, in excluding him from a seat in this body—vindicated by a majority of his colleagues here, vindicated of any offense, and held entitled to his seat as a United States Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, just briefly in answer to the Senator's speech, commencing with his last statement, if he holds that the vote in the Senate vindicated Senator NEWBERRY he owes to Senator NEWBERRY and every friend of his in the world an apology, an abject apology, for attaching to his vote of vindication a resolution of condemnation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I intended to comment on that vote of condemnation, as the Senator describes it. He called attention incorrectly to a portion of the resolution. He read that part of the resolution which condemned the expenditure of money in a campaign and said that was a condemnation of Senator NEWBERRY. He also stated, perhaps inadvertently, as he will see by referring to the stenographic record of his remarks, that the Senate found Senator NEWBERRY expended an undue amount of money. There is not a word in the resolution to the effect that Senator NEWBERRY expended an undue amount of money or that he was guilty of any offense. The resolution condemned the use of that amount of money. It did not undertake to fix upon Senator NEWBERRY the responsibility for the expenditure. That question was one of the principal questions in the case, which the Senator from Arkansas assumes to have been defined and to have been affirmed in the resolution, knowing there is not a word in the resolution to that effect.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment that I may make a request?

Mr. CARAWAY. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Certain Members of the Senate on both sides prefer that we should agree to vote upon the pending resolution on Monday next at or before 4 o'clock, and the Assistant Secretary is drawing the unanimous-consent agreement. So I ask the Senator if he will not suspend for the time being until we may either accept or reject that agreement?

Mr. CARAWAY. May I suggest that I hope if we can agree here among ourselves no Senator will make the point of no quorum until I am through. It will only take me a moment or two.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not necessary to do that at all. This is not a bill; it is a resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. I suspend for the purpose, as requested by the Senator from Wyoming.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, to amend the standing rules of the Senate, so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. I submit the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at the conclusion of to-day's business the Senate will take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday next, and at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on the so-called "four-power treaty" the Senate will proceed to the consideration of S. Res. 218, and at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on said day (Monday, Mar. 6, 1922) the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and then upon the question of agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say, Mr. President, that I have no objection to the proposed agreement? I think we will get to a vote about 2 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. WARREN. I do not remember exactly how the agreement reads in that respect.

Mr. HARRISON. It says not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have no objection to making that arrangement, provided we can couple with it that immediately after the vote is had upon this resolution the Senate will vote, without further debate, upon the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] to refer my resolution to investigate the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I want that matter disposed of, and if I can get that done I shall have no objection to the agreement proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to that as a separate proposition, but the one I have proposed should not be joined with other subjects.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama desires my assurance, so far as securing unanimous consent is concerned, I can, of course, only speak for myself, but I am only too anxious to have a vote on the Senator's resolution which I moved should be so referred. If it can be done without debate, I shall be glad to join with him in having a vote taken at any time.

Mr. HEFLIN. There will be no harm in coupling it with this proposition. There seems to be no objection to my proposal.

Mr. WARREN. Since I asked for this agreement, the Senator will see the inconsistency of consenting to any agreement in behalf of the committee in the absence of its chairman. I think there will be no trouble if the Senator from Alabama wants to ask it as a separate proposition, but I dislike to undertake to accompany my proposition with such a proposition as that.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no desire to hamper the chairman of the committee or the Senate in the passage of the resolution which they have in hand. The Senate is going to pass the resolution which they have up. Although I am opposed to it I am not in favor of doing anything to delay a vote on it, so I will withdraw my request for the present and present it later as a separate proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement presented by the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and it is entered into.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that the pending resolution may be reprinted showing the amendments which have been adopted, so that we may have the matter before us in better shape to take it up on Monday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a minute. I want to reiterate my statement that for the Senator from Washington personally I have a very kind feeling. Personally I do not like to criticize him, and I kept as far away from doing that as I could. I shall refer briefly to his first statement that, although I had his letter before me, I misquoted him when I inferred that he could not get suitable publicity in the State of Washington for his statement of what the record of the Newberry case disclosed. I read his statement as follows:

> I have made several statements as to my views of the Newberry case, but do not suppose the newspapers to which they were sent have printed them in such a way as to attract attention.

The mere fact of publishing matter, but publishing it in such a way that no publicity may be obtained for it is denying to the Senator from Washington the publicity of his views, and he himself says that he has furnished the statements, but the newspapers will not publish them in such a way that people may be able to read what he says. If that was not what the Senator from Washington intended to say to his correspondent, I am frank to say that he was unhappy in the language which he used, because everyone who has read it has understood that the Senator was complaining, and, therefore, was compelled to use the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order to get publicity.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What did my statement say, I will ask the Senator, about the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? Why does the Senator say that? There is nothing said about the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in my statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. What was the Senator's object in putting the letter in the RECORD?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That letter was not put into the RECORD until after it was printed. It was in reply to a letter of a constituent. There was nothing said in it about the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. CARAWAY. What was the object of the Senator in putting it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There were various objects, but its publication in the RECORD had no relation to the point the Senator is making. The point the Senator is making is as to the contents of the letter, and the statement he quotes is not contained in the letter.

Mr. CARAWAY. The statement which I have read is contained in the letter. I was reading from the Senator's letter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not want to delay the Senate, and I do not think the Senator intends to misrepresent, but I wish him to point out where there is anything said in the letter about wanting to get it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not say that was in the letter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood the Senator to say that.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I said that evidently the Senator could not get publicity for his views and was therefore driven to that course. That is the conclusion which the Senator from Arkansas reached.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, well, I have no complaint of the Senator's conclusion.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well. Now, if I understood the Senator correctly—and I want to be sure I did—in speaking of the vindication of Senator NEWBERRY in the election in Michigan I understood the Senator from Washington to say that Senator NEWBERRY had sons and brothers in the Army; that the people who had relatives in the Army voted for NEWBERRY; that Ford kept his son out of the Army, and that the people who agreed with him voted for Ford. Is that the Senator's statement?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; that was not my statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. Can the Senator tell me the difference between my summary and his statement?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I can. There was an issue made between the people who had sons in the Army and those who kept their sons out of the Army, and between those who were in favor of a victorious peace and those who were in favor of a peace without victory. That is true. I did not say that everybody who kept their sons out of the Army voted for Ford.

Mr. CARAWAY. Was it the intention of the Senator that the people should understand that those who were loyal and let their sons serve in the Army voted for NEWBERRY?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I said that that issue was made in the State; that that was one of the issues.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not say for whom they voted.

Mr. CARAWAY. But that was the inference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the Senator's own inference.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and it is the only inference that could be drawn from the Senator's statement. If that is true, if the Senator's statement is correct, there were only a few more than 4,000 people who voted in the election in Michigan who were loyal as distinguished from those who were not loyal.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Arkansas means if his inference is correct, not my statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. My inference is from what the Senator said. I can not know what he has in his mind as a mental reservation. The Senator takes issue with the statement that money was the cause of Senator NEWBERRY being elected to the Senate. I am going to quote from Senator NEWBERRY himself, the highest authority of whom I know. Here is what he said in his speech which was carefully prepared——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me correct the Senator. I do not know whether or not the Senator is annoyed by my interrupting him. If so, I shall not do so further.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not object in the least.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I merely wanted again to correct the Senator. In his reference to the statement made by me the form in which he states it now is that the use of money was the cause of Mr. NEWBERRY being elected to the Senate. I can imagine that, to some extent at least, publicity might be the cause of a man being elected to the Senate. Advertisements in newspapers, the circulation of literature, mailing letters to voters, all of which cost a great deal of money, might be the cause of his being elected to the Senate. That was not the statement that I challenged. The statement which I challenged was the statement that the seat in the Senate had been bought. That was one statement. Another statement was that Senator NEWBERRY had bought a seat in the Senate. That is a very different thing from what the Senator from Arkansas is now stating. I repeat that neither one of those statements is substantiated by any evidence.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator would not change his position so often, we would reach a conclusion; but I realize the impossibility of ever reaching a final issue with the Senator when he undertakes to give an explanation that differs from his original statement. I say that if a man uses more money than is legitimate and right and uses it as the record in this case shows money was used, to buy votes, if he himself says that the money he used was responsible for his election, he concedes that he bought his seat. NEWBERRY himself said:

> The amount expended was large, more than I had any idea was being expended, and more than ought to be necessary to expend in any ordinary campaign. But this was not an ordinary campaign.
> I shall not dwell upon the reasons which the committee thought imperatively demanded a campaign of newspaper publicity involving this expenditure of money. I can only say that I regret exceedingly the fact that so large an amount of money was necessarily expended.

In other words, if that means anything, it means that if he had limited his expenses to a reasonable and lawful amount he could not have been elected. No other explanation under any refinement of the language is possible. "I regret that it was necessary to expend so much money"—necessary for what purpose? Necessary in order that he might be nominated; that is all. If it does not mean that, it does not mean anything.

The Senator from Washington says that the sin of buying the nomination was wiped out by the ratification by the people of Mr. NEWBERRY's candidacy in the November election. I regret that Senators in the course of their careers find it impossible to be consistent. Senator Isaac Stephenson, of Wisconsin, and his friends together, according to the record, expended $107,000 for the nomination, and he was afterwards elected. Subsequent to his election the Senator from Washington, when he was a progressive and before he became a standpatter, in one of the ablest speeches delivered in the Senate declared that Senator Stephenson was not entitled to his seat; that, although his election had been ratified by the people of Wisconsin, it was vitiated and void by reason of the excessive expenditure of money in the primary election.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that there is some difference between the Stephenson case and this case.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes; one arose in Wisconsin and the other in Michigan; the Senator in one case was named Isaac Stephenson and in the other TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY; otherwise, except that NEWBERRY spent three times as much and twice as corruptly, the cases are exactly alike.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator says they are.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and the Senator from Washington agreed with me at one time. I have read his speech since I commenced preparing my remarks delivered on this occasion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; the Senator from Washington never agreed with that, and he never made any such statement. There was a vital difference between the case of Senator Stephenson, of Wisconsin, and the case of Senator NEWBERRY, of Michigan. The Senator from Arkansas may not think that the difference is important, but nevertheless there was a difference, although he says now that it does not exist. One was that in the Wisconsin case the candidate himself put up the money, knowing for what purpose it was to be used, while in the Michigan case, at least the weight of the testimony is that the Senator from Michigan did not know how much money was being put up and did not put it up himself. Another difference—and a much more important difference, in my opinion—is that in the Wisconsin case the matter never was submitted to the people of the State of Wisconsin, while in the Michigan case, under the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, it was submitted to the people, the highest authority of the State, thoroughly discussed, and determined by them upon this issue, practically exclusive of any other consideration. That, in my opinion, is a very vital distinction between the Michigan case and the Wisconsin case.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am curious to know why the Senator says that was the issue, when he stated in his letter to Thomas Marshall on the 26th day of last January that the war and patriotism were the issues. That is what the Senator from Washington said in his letter to Marshall, and now he says that the issue was money.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator let me read two or three lines from what I did say?

Mr. CARAWAY. I know what the Senator said, but I shall yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I quote from my letter as follows:

Another circumstance, which is not disputed at all, is that there is no evidence whatever that any improper amount of money was used in the general election campaign at which NEWBERRY was elected to the Senate. The only evidence introduced was as to the expenditure of money in the primary election, at which he was nominated. In the general election at which he was chosen Senator—

I wish the Senator would mark this statement—the very question of the expenditure of money in the primary election was submitted to the voters of Michigan and made the chief issue in the campaign.

The Senator disputes that.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I do not dispute it; but the Senator also states that the election was in war time, and that patriotism was the issue in the primary, where the expenditure of money occurred. Of course, I may always be answered, like anyone else, that wise men change their opinions, but it will amuse other people and somewhat plague the Senator from Washington to lay his speech in the Stephenson case alongside of his speech in the Newberry case and determine that the same man made them both. It could very well be said, I think, that they were made by two men bearing the same name, because it seems improbable that the same man, an able lawyer and a distinguished Senator, a man of whom I am very fond, indeed, should have made two speeches touching the same question, the corrupt use of money in a primary and election, and reach such diametrically opposite conclusions.

The Senator says I was wholly mistaken in reference to the nature of the resolution for which the Senator voted; that that was a general resolution and had nothing to do with the Newberry case. I want to read it for the Senator again, because I am frank to say that I imagine there are many things in this record which the Senator, in his haste to vote for Senator NEWBERRY and to get rid of the influences that were trying to keep him from doing so, overlooked.

Here is the resolution:

That whether the amount expended in this primary—

Whose primary? TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY'S; the only one the Senate had before it; the only primary it was discussing.

That whether the amount expended in this primary—

The NEWBERRY primary—was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.

The expenditure of such excessive sums—

What sums? The NEWBERRY sums.

in behalf of a candidate—

What candidate? NEWBERRY.

either with or without his knowledge—

The Senator from Washington cuts himself off now from his defense that it was spent without NEWBERRY'S knowledge, because the resolution says that this expenditure is condemned whether it was made with or without his knowledge.

Either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures—are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

What expenditures? By NEWBERRY and NEWBERRY'S friends.

They were not talking about some hypothetical case. The resolution was dealing with the NEWBERRY case; and when the Senator from Washington voted for that resolution, and when the majority of the Senate voted for it, they voted for a resolution condemning the methods by which TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY obtained his nomination and election, and then they call that a vindication! I pray God that I shall not get vindicated in that way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Arkansas a question. Suppose it had been shown that a large number of voters in the State had been prohibited from access to the polls by the criminal act of some man in Michigan, and Senator NEWBERRY was admitted to know nothing about it and not to have any part whatever in it, and the Senate should pass a resolution condemning it. Would the Senator say that that would be equivalent to a resolution condemning Senator NEWBERRY?

Mr. CARAWAY. I say that no Senator would have voted for a resolution of any such nature coupling it with a resolution to seat Senator NEWBERRY if that had been the fact; and it is perfectly ridiculous, if I may be permitted to say it—and yet I am entirely respectful to other people's opinions, although the Senator from Washington prefaced his remarks by saying that I was a bitter partisan——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not say "bitter."

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, that is what the Senator's statement meant, and I do not take offense at it. I am a partisan; but, so help me Almighty God, no partisanship ever entered into my mind when it came to a question of whether a man did right or wrong. That is a declaration of mine and it has no other evidence back of it except my simple declaration. I would not have voted to seat any man from any party if I had believed, as I think every man who reads this record must know, that this seat was obtained by the corrupt use of money. I say, sir, and I believe I state the simple truth, that 90 per cent of the Senators who voted to seat Senator NEWBERRY never read the 2,000 pages of the record. I can not conceive that they did. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], who got here one day and voted the next, or the next after that, sat here in the Senate all the time and did not have an opportunity to read it, and yet he goes out and arraigns everybody else who did not agree with him, and I venture the assertion that he could not have read one-tenth of the record. I read every line of that record.

It took me not two days nor two weeks, but to try to know what it contained took more than a month; and before I ever gave expression to a view with reference to TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY'S right to a seat here I had read every line of the evidence of every witness who testified in that case that was available in this printed record. I would not have voted for or against Senator NEWBERRY, to give him a seat or to restrain him from a seat in this body, without knowing all the evidence that could be obtained, any more than, if I were on a jury, I would ever sentence a man to death without having heard the evidence that disclosed that he was guilty of a crime. A man's honor, valuable property rights, the honor of a seat in the Senate, and the welfare of 110,000,000 of American citizens—aye, good government everywhere—demanded that the man who cast a vote there should know what the facts were, and vote in accordance with the facts.

I was upbraided because it was said that I was a follower of Woodrow Wilson. I voted for him, and I am rather proud of the fact; and if to-day God should be so kind as to restore his physical health, and it could be known that he would be in a place in these United States and address the people upon public issues he would get ten times more people to hear him than any other man who walks the earth to-day. It is not a question of whether he was right or wrong. Much of his administration I did not approve, and much of it I do not approve now; and if the Senator meant to say that I was a blind follower of Woodrow Wilson, of course, the Senator never read my record at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the reason why I did not say that the Senator was a blind follower of Mr. Wilson.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what the Senator intended to say, but he wanted to leave room to explain that that was not what he meant. I do not fall out with the Senator, for that is one of the soft impeachments.

The Senator did not answer this question.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that he did not say in his letter that this money was expended for advertisements or other legal expenditures, but legitimate expenditures—proper expenditures. That is what it means—not legal; not the naked, legal question of whether it was an offense against the law, but whether it was proper or not. I asked the Senator, and he did not answer me, whether he thought it was a legitimate expenditure when this man hired 15 men at $5 apiece, and said that the men he selected had worked for him in politics before—worked for him, mind you, is his language. They had not worked for a cause, but had been his henchmen, his machine.

They were the things with which he could control results. He said they had worked for him before. He did not know whom they were supporting before he hired them. His purpose was to get them to support NEWBERRY. He hired them for what purpose? To support NEWBERRY. He simply asked them, if they were not tied up, to support NEWBERRY. He said it was his intention to get their support and their votes for NEWBERRY.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How much money did he pay them?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, he hired 15 men at one polling place.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was $150.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, wait; the amount is not the important thing. The Senator does not say that most of this money was spent for advertisements or other legal expenses, but that it was all expended for advertising or other legitimate expenses. Now, does the Senator call that a legitimate expense or expenditure?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I assume that there is no law in the State of Michigan against hiring a man to work up to the limit fixed by the statute.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, that is not it. The Senator knows the difference between "legal" and "legitimate." Does the Senator call that a legitimate expenditure?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; in the sense that it is not prohibited by the law.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is legal. The Senator must know the difference between "legitimate" and "legal." Is that a legitimate expenditure?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not regard it as a proper expenditure, but I do regard it as legitimate and allowed by the law up to the very narrow limit fixed by the statute of Michigan; and if you want to make a case of expulsion over that, then you ought to pass a law prohibiting it altogether.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not the point. The Senator, then, unqualifiedly says he thinks that is a legitimate expenditure?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. All right. Does the Senator think it was an entirely legitimate expenditure to put $400 in an envelope——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I want to say this, if the Senator will permit me: I do not undertake to go into every punctilio. I am dealing with the substance of the case. I have no doubt that there were some instances, perhaps, where the law was violated, although if there were it is a wonder that the great organization that was on the track of these men did not get some of them and send them to jail; but the instances that the Senator has cited so far do not constitute any violation of the law and constitute no substantial question which would affect the result of the election in any way whatever.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator now is wandering away from the point. He made the definite answer that he regarded that as a legitimate expenditure. Does he regard the putting of $400 into an envelope and giving it to a man in the headquarters to go out, of course, and do what he pleased with it, as legitimate? Just "yes" or "no."

Mr. POINDEXTER. It depends on the purpose for which it was given to him.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what the record shows—that they had him in the office, and wanted him to support NEWBERRY, and laid before him an envelope, sealed, for him to take, and he took it and went away, and when he opened it he found that it contained $400.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How much money was that?

Mr. CARAWAY. That was $400.

Mr. POINDEXTER. With the $150, that makes $550.

Mr. CARAWAY. Just wait. We will get more than that in a minute. Is that a legitimate expenditure, in the eyes of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It depends altogether upon the purpose for which it was given. Let me complete my answer. There are certain expenditures on which, under the laws of Michigan, no limit of expense is fixed at all—traveling expenses, postage, advertising. Then, in addition to that, there are certain other expenses, which I assume might cover the case of Bohn, from the northern peninsula, which are limited by the law; but there is no contention that the comparatively trivial amounts to which the Senator refers exceed the limit provided in the statutes of Michigan.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is not any statute of Michigan permitting the buying of votes, and the Senator must know that. The Senator evades the question. Does he regard the putting of $400 in an envelope and sealing it up and handing it to a man in the headquarters of a candidate for the Senate as a legitimate expenditure of that candidate's money?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have answered the Senator's question. I do not care to repeat my answer.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well. Does the Senator regard as legitimate—I shall not now be able to recall the names, because there were so many of them—the case where one man testified that he and another man went over a county, took two days, and gave to about 30 different people from $10 to $20 each, and said, "Our purpose was to get their influence and their votes"? Was that a legitimate expenditure of money?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to see the evidence about that; as to who was responsible for it.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator had read the record he would have found it. I shall be glad to get it and show it to him, however.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I shall be glad to see it.

Mr. CARAWAY. There are innumerable cases of the kind.

I think, if the Senator wants to figure it up, that $263,000 can be traced in this election. The candidate himself admits $195,000 of it, and the fact that the candidate had knowledge of it is so apparent that nobody conscientiously can deny it. The candidate knew in advance that he was going to have $50,000 expended for him; and I want to call the attention of the Senator right here to this statement:

The candidate is a business man, a big business man. I do not fall out with him for that, for men of that kind develop this country, largely. An honest man is an honest man whether he is worth ten millions or ten cents, and wealth does not make dishonor nor does poverty make honor; and while the Senator rather imputed that to me a minute ago, he never heard me give utterance to any such sentiment at all.

The Senator from Michigan was a big business man. He entered a race where he was told that it would cost at least $50,000 to elect him, and this record is as silent as the tomb as to what source he expected this $50,000 to come from. I know, and everybody knows, I do not care what the record shows or does not show, that Senator NEWBERRY knew who was going to furnish that money. He would have been a fool to have gone into a campaign, hire his campaign manager, and open headquarters, knowing it was to cost $50,000, and not knowing a single individual who would contribute a penny. If anybody believes Senator NEWBERRY did a thing like that he is unkind to Senator NEWBERRY, because I know he has too much sense to have done a foolish thing like that.

Smith testified that on the 27th day of July, 1918, a month before the election, he and NEWBERRY were talking over the phone, and NEWBERRY was complaining about the balances, and when asked what balances, he said the balances that were being taken from all the accounts to feed into John Newberry's account in order to feed this election machine that was buying a sent for him in Michigan. He knew it a month, if he knew it no time longer than that, that they were using his own money, and they were using so much of it and taking it from all the accounts until he was complaining and saying, "Oh, when will these expenses cease?" He was told they would cease on primary day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator knows, does he not, that all those questions were submitted to the people of Michigan in a general election; that the circumstances he refers to occurred in the primary election, and were made an issue in the general election, and that the people of Michigan decided that question?

Mr. CARAWAY. Is that a satisfactory answer of the Senator, that if NEWBERRY bought his seat, if the people of Michigan were willing for him to buy it, the Senator has no objection to his purchasing a seat?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have discussed that at considerable length.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator's answer meant anything, that is what it meant, that the people of Michigan, knowing that NEWBERRY bought his seat, ratified it, and therefore the Senator from Washington has no concern with it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has repeated his statement that Mr. NEWBERRY bought his seat. That is one of the charges without any substantiation whatever.

Mr. CARAWAY. The evidence I was reciting proves that; but I want to say right now, just to correct the Senator, because I know he wants to be exactly fair, that these things were not submitted to the people of Michigan, because the investigation before the grand jury, the trial before the petit jury, and the investigation before the Senate committee were not had until after the election, and all the people knew were the published statements of the campaign committee, and they disclosed none of these facts, and to say that those questions were submitted to the people of Michigan is wholly incorrect. The people of Michigan did not have that knowledge.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It was all submitted to the people of Michigan in a fair and free election, which was held months after the alleged occurrences the Senator refers to, and in which the whole issue was thoroughly discussed. It was later on submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the Supreme Court decided that inasmuch as the law under which the expenditures were made was unconstitutional it could not punish him. That is what the Supreme Court said.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Four of the judges who concurred in that decision, notwithstanding the assertion of the Senator from Arkansas, as shown by their opinions I have read into the RECORD, consequently whose judgment went to make it the judgment of the court, found that the instructions at the trial were erroneous.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator made two misstatements. Four judges did not concur in that opinion. The Chief Justice dissented from the opinion that the act was unconstitutional. He did think that the instruction of the court was in error, but he thought the man was guilty, because he said the case should be remanded for a new trial under proper instructions.

How the Senator could stand in his place and say that the court vindicated him is beyond the comprehension of anybody who knows what the meaning of a court decision is, because the court did not say any such thing, and I hope the Senator will publish the entire personal opinions of the four judges on whom he relies for the vindication of Senator NEWBERRY, because they do not bear out what the Senator claims, even if they had a right to call an individual opinion an opinion of the court.

I shall, however, not discuss it further at this time. I shall put all the citations in the RECORD again.

RECESS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Senate shall take a recess until 11 o'clock Monday morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Senate stands in recess until 11 o'clock on Monday next.

Thereupon the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) took a recess until Monday, March 6, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATION OF LIEUT. COL. ROBERT GRAY PECK.

In executive session this day, following the confirmation of Maj. Robert Gray Peck to be a lieutenant colonel in the Regular Army, on request of Mr. REED, and by unanimous consent, the injunction of secrecy was removed from the vote by which Lieut. Col. Peck was confirmed.

The vote on confirmation resulted—yeas 41, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Ball	Johnson	New	Stanfield
Brandegee	Keyes	Newberry	Sutherland
Calder	King	Norbeck	Townsend
Cameron	Ladd	Oddie	Wadsworth
Cummins	Lenroot	Page	Warren
Dillingham	Lodge	Pepper	Watson, Ind.
Fernald	McCormick	Phipps	Weller
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Poindexter	Williams
Glass	McKinley	Sheppard
Gooding	McNary	Shortridge
Hale	Myers	Smoot

NAYS—19.

Ashurst	Heflin	Norris	Simmons
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomerene	Stanley
Caraway	Kendrick	Rawson	Watson, Ga.
France	McKellar	Reed	Willis
Harreld	Nelson	Shields

NOT VOTING—36.

Borah	Edge	Kellogg	Robinson
Broussard	Elkins	La Follette	Smith
Bursum	Ernst	McLean	Spencer
Colt	Fletcher	Moses	Sterling
Crow	Gerry	Nicholson	Swanson
Culberson	Harris	Overman	Trammell
Curtis	Harrison	Owen	Underwood
Dial	Hitchcock	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
du Pont	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.

So Maj. Robert Gray Peck was confirmed as a lieutenant colonel.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] withheld his vote on account of his general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] but stated that, if permitted to vote, he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] withheld his vote on account of his general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] transferred his general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and voted "nay."

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] transferred his general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and voted "yea."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] announced that he was paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] and that, if permitted to vote, he would vote "nay" and the Senator from Connecticut would vote "yea."

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] announced his general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and stated that, if permitted to vote, he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] transferred his general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON] and voted "yea."

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], after having voted "yea," withdrew his vote on account of his general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], not being able to secure a transfer.

On this question, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] was paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. Senator FLETCHER would have voted "yea," if present, and Senator HARRIS would have voted "nay."

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 6, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, February 23, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

PACKERS IN UNRELATED LINES OF BUSINESS (S. DOC. NO. 145).

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on Thursday last, during my temporary absence from the Senate, a communication came in from the Attorney General transmitting, in response to Senate resolution 211, a report of the steps taken to enforce and carry out the consent decree entered by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia on February 27, 1920, in the suit of the United States of America against Swift & Co. and others. The resolution itself was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and they were directed to take certain action. The report is still on the table, I understand. I ask that the report of the Attorney General be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be taken from the table, printed, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McNary	Smith
Ball	Hale	Myers	Spencer
Borah	Harreld	Nelson	Stanfield
Brandegee	Harris	New	Sterling
Bursum	Harrison	Newberry	Sutherland
Cameron	Heflin	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Johnson	Oddie	Underwood
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Wadsworth
Colt	Kellogg	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Culberson	Kendrick	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	Keyes	Poindexter	Warren
Edge	King	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Fernald	Ladd	Ransdell	Weller
Fletcher	Lodge	Rawson	Willis
France	McKellar	Reed
Glass	McKinley	Sheppard

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent on account of a death in his family.

I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DIAL] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting the petition of Albert G. Gilpin, chairman of a committee of former service men of the Mount Alto Hospital, and others, praying for the granting of adequate relief to disabled ex-service men and the semimonthly payment of compensation, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution unanimously adopted by a convention of manufacturers held under the auspices of the National Association of Manufacturers, at Washington, D. C., January 30-31, 1922, favoring inclusion of the American valuation plan in the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDGE. I present a numerously signed petition from citizens of New Jersey. The petition has been signed by approximately 10,000 citizens of that State, and prays for a modification of the so-called Volstead Act. I ask that it be given the appropriate reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KEYES presented a resolution adopted by the New Hampshire Savings Bank Association, protesting against the proposal to increase the rate of interest upon postal savings from 2 per cent to 3 per cent, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the directors of the Concordia (Kans.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring acceptance of the proposal of Henry Ford relative to Muscle Shoals project, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Liberal National Loan Association, of Liberal, Kans., protesting against the enactment of legislation tending to repeal or amend the Federal farm loan act, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. LADD presented the petition of W. P. Jinnett, of Williston, N. Dak., praying for relief to the suffering peoples of Austria by deferring payment of Austria's debt for 20 years, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petitions of S. J. Jensen and 40 others of Englevale, Herman Hall and 18 others of Overly, E. B. Larson and 21 others of Hillsboro, Fred E. Sims and 7 others of Willow City, Walter Huether and 2 others of Elliott, Mrs. Zelpha Hedbert and 15 others of Carpio and vicinity, F. W. Stedman and 24 others of Berg, John Underland and 5 others of Hettinger, E. N. Sterner and 62 others of Hazelton and vicinity, and H. J. Zehner and 45 others of Epworth and vicinity, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts:

A bill (S. 3243) for the relief of Abram Burke; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. JONES of New Mexico:

A bill (S. 3244) to authorize the transfer of surplus books from the Navy Department to the Interior Department; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 174) providing for the presentation of a replica of the statue of Robert Emmet to the National Gallery of Ireland and to the Irish people; to the Committee on the Library.

AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY TO HAITI.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment? If what I desire to suggest shall provoke any debate, I shall not ask the Senator to yield.

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I tried to obtain recognition on Saturday last to offer a resolution which I shall now offer. If it provokes any debate, I shall withdraw it. The resolution asks the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary as to a certain matter. I send the resolution to the Secretary's desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 249) was read, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has designated Brig. Gen. John H. Russell as high commissioner to Haiti, with the rank of ambassador extraordinary to the Government of that country, without having sent the nomination of said Brig. Gen. John H. Russell to the Senate for the advice and consent of the Senate with respect to his appointment to said office: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is hereby requested to investigate the question as to the power of the President under the Constitution to appoint an ambassador extraordinary to Haiti without the advice and consent of the Senate in that behalf, and report their findings and opinion to the Senate.

Mr. KING. I ask for the present consideration and adoption of the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I think the resolution had better go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

MEMORIAL SERVICES IN HONOR OF THE LATE MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM CRAWFORD GORGAS.

Mr. HEFLIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 250), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,500 copies of Senate Document No. 390, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, entitled "Memorial Services Held in Honor of Maj. Gen. William Crawford Gorgas," for the use of the Senate document room.

REPORT OF THE WOOD-FORBES PHILIPPINE MISSION.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, there has been a great demand for copies of the report of the special mission on investigation to the Philippine Islands, which was submitted to the Secretary of War. The document has been entirely exhausted, the copy which I hold in my hand being the last one remaining in the document room. I ask unanimous consent that there may be ordered a reprint of the document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana desire to have the matter referred to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. WARREN. That will not be necessary if it is only desired to print a small number of copies.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to inquire whether the report was originally printed by the Senate or by the department?

Mr. NEW. It was, I think, printed by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary advises the Chair that the report appears to have been printed by the War Department.

Mr. NEW. I may be mistaken in my statement as to how the report was printed. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] brought the copy of the report which I have to me a few moments ago with the request that I ask for a reprint. I have had similar requests from two or three other Senators, and a number of requests from outside sources for copies of the report. I am not sure whether it was printed by the Senate or by the War Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that the report be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to its being printed as a Senate document.

Mr. NEW. Very well; let the report be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FLETCHER. If it is referred to the Committee on Printing, the question whether Congress should bear the cost of the printing or the War Department should bear it may be determined, and possibly it may be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CULBERSON.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, a day of two ago the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] issued a statement which has been widely published in his State, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask that it be printed in 8-point type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1922.

To the Democrats of Texas:

On the 25th day of January last I issued a statement to you to the effect that I purposed submitting my name to the Democratic primary next summer for the nomination for the United States Senate, and that later on I would issue a further statement to you on the subject.

This further statement which I now make will, generally and broadly speaking, be a review of my record in the Senate during my present term and my position on important public questions of the day.

As is well known, I took an active part in the nomination of Woodrow Wilson for the Presidency in 1912.

His first term as President, beginning in 1913, was largely devoted to domestic affairs and was a record of unexampled achievement in such policies. So strongly did he impress the country, and so prosperous was it under his administration, that he was unanimously renominated in 1916 and reelected, being the only Democrat since Andrew Jackson to succeed himself in the Presidency.

During the first four years of my present term, beginning in 1917, Mr. Wilson was President of the United States, and, as in his first term, so in his second term I supported his policies.

During his second term, beginning in 1917, foreign affairs largely dominated his administration, and he carried the United States to the leadership of the nations.

His doctrine of self-determination restored the liberties of Poland, made Ireland a free State, and gave fresh hope to countless other millions struggling for liberty throughout the world.

In truth, the stand of the United States under his leadership saved democracy for mankind and rescued our imperiled civilization.

Coming to particular measures of legislation during this period, and my attitude upon them, I supported the declaration that a state of war existed between the United States and the Imperial German Government, in April, 1917.

I supported the draft act, under which the American Army was organized.

In cooperation with the Texas delegation in Congress, I urged upon the President and the Secretary of War the policy, which was pursued, of establishing large training camps in Texas.

I favored the emergency bond issue to meet the expenditures for national security and defense to assist in prosecuting the war.

I supported the food control bill encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

I favored the resolution to limit debate in the Senate, the purpose being to expedite urgent war measures.

As chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary during the entire period of the war, I introduced some of the important legislative acts of the war.

Among these, the act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

This law, commonly called the espionage act, protected the Government in its conduct of the war by punishing spies and restricting their opportunities, by penalizing obstruction of Army and Navy recruiting and enlistment, by safeguarding the ocean-borne commerce, and by eliminating freedom of foreign propagandists.

The act under which all German liners in American ports were seized, and later all Austrian liners, which authorized the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of any vessel within its jurisdiction which at the time of coming therein was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States was at war.

The act to punish the willful injury or destruction of war materials or of war premises or utilities used in connection with war material.

The armistice, which ended active hostilities, was signed November 11, 1918.

The Peace Conference, which settled all matters arising out of the war, met in December, 1918.

I voted for the ratification of the treaty of Versailles, which was the result of this conference.

This treaty was the greatest forward step ever taken to secure the peace of the world.

It was defeated by the Republicans of the Senate, because its ratification would have redounded to the credit of the Democratic Party and the fame of President Wilson.

Its rejection by the Senate has kept the world in political and economic disorder.

Its ratification, on the contrary, would have tended toward peace among all nations and restoration of normal economic conditions.

The benefit to the United States of its ratification can not be overestimated along economic lines, because, producing a surplus of agricultural and manufactured products, it would have stabilized European conditions and given us a market for this surplus, whereas now, under present conditions, this surplus is either not produced or it is a drug upon our domestic market.

I opposed the submission of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States as an invasion of the reserved rights of the States, but when it was adopted I favored its enforcement, under my oath of office.

I voted against the so-called light wine and beer bill, believing it to be an evasion of the eighteenth amendment.

I am proud to say that I favored the submission of the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, extending the right of suffrage to women.

I voted for its submission three times. First in October, 1918, when it failed to get the necessary two-thirds vote; in February, 1919, when it failed again; and, finally, in June, 1919, when it passed the Senate.

I voted for the act providing for the termination of Federal control of the railroads.

I opposed the Esch-Cummins railroad transportation bill.

I voted to continue the War Finance Corporation, for the relief of the agricultural depression, which corporation has to date approved advances of approximately $12,800,000 to Texas banks and financial institutions and has extended nearly $10,000,000 in credit to cooperative associations.

I voted for the Federal good roads act, appropriating $75,000,000 for the construction and maintenance of roads.

I voted for the Federal farm loan act and had a share in the creation of a separate district for Texas and the establishment of the Federal land bank at Houston, which has already loaned to Texas farmers nearly $50,000,000 at reasonable rates of interest.

I voted for the act to create a Federal live-stock commission to regulate the meat-packing industry.

I voted for the act making appropriations to continue the nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals, Ala.

I favor the idea of leasing or selling Muscle Shoals to Henry Ford on proper terms.

I voted for the bill providing adjusted compensation for the veterans of the World War. I shall continue my support of that legislation.

I voted for the act providing additional hospital facilities for disabled ex-soldiers.

I voted for the Sheppard Maternity Act.

I voted against the new Republican revenue tax law, which ought to be designated as a method of relieving the rich from the payment of their just share of taxation.

I voted against the Republican emergency tariff act, and voted against extending it later.

I voted to ratify the treaty with Colombia, making restitution for the seizure of the Panama Canal site.

I voted against the bill providing free tolls through the Panama Canal for American ships engaged in coastwise trade because these ships already enjoy a legal monopoly of that trade which should not be added to by this gratuity.

I voted against the separate treaty with Germany terminating the state of war.

I voted against the resolution declaring Senator NEWBERRY entitled to his seat as a Senator from Michigan.

I am opposed, of course, to the antilynching bill which recently passed the House of Representatives because, among other reasons, it is an encroachment upon the reserved police powers of the States.

I stand unreservedly on the declaration adopted in the Clayton antitrust law, on my motion, that "the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce."

While there are other matters of importance and gravity, yet, in my judgment, the paramount and pressing questions which now confront the American people are the restoration of economic conditions and the application of sound principles of taxation in raising the necessary revenue for the support of the Government.

To restore economic conditions many things may be done, but nothing is more important in this connection than the curtailment of governmental expenditures wherever practicable, the encouragement of labor and agriculture, and the enlargement of markets for American products.

To provide the necessary funds for the support of the Government, resort should be had primarily to the indirect method of tariff taxation and the direct method of income and other direct taxation.

With reference to the tariff, I favor the levying of revenue duties on practically all imports, whether raw material or the finished product, and I am opposed to the levying of protective duties on any imports, whether raw material or the finished product.

In respect to direct taxes, the basic principle to be followed is to levy such taxes in proportion to the benefits received from the Government and the ability to pay the taxes.

It is perhaps not extravagant to say that no more important sessions of the Congress have been held in its history than during my present term.

As is well known, I have not enjoyed robust health for some time, but, notwithstanding this, I have been a daily attendant upon the sessions of the Senate.

The sessions of the Congress, during my present term, cover 1,217 days, and I have not missed a day.

During the five years which I have served of this term I have voted on practically all important questions which were before the Senate, and where I have not voted on minor questions I have usually been protected by a pair.

While my name will be submitted to you in the forthcoming primary, yet candor impels me to say that I am not strong enough to make a canvass of the State. My candidacy must therefore be left largely to the Democrats generally, men and women, who approve my views upon public questions and for whose support and friendship I will be profoundly grateful.

C. A. CULBERSON.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on March 4, 1922, the President approved and signed the act (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session, with a view to the consideration of the four-power treaty.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I wish to announce that on the assembling of the Senate on to-morrow, if a recess shall be taken, I shall address the Senate upon the subject of the four-power and other treaties, and if an adjournment shall be taken to-day I shall take occasion to do so at the close of the morning hour.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, on Saturday last I gave notice that I would ask the indulgence of the Senate on the opening of the session this morning to address it upon the subject of the treaties, particularly with reference to the four-power treaty. It is pursuant to that notice that I now rise.

For two or three reasons I particularly request that I be permitted to proceed without interruption, first, frankly, because I prefer that what I have to say may appear consecutively in the RECORD, and, secondly, because the Senate is operating under a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on another matter at 4 o'clock this afternoon, a matter which has been before the Senate for some days, on which several Senators still desire to be heard, and, therefore, interpolated remarks and interruptions might unduly prolong my own address.

Mr. President, before proceeding to a brief consideration of the four-power treaty between the United States, Great Britain, France, and Japan, I wish to offer a few remarks on certain matters which lie at the root of all the treaties concluded at the recent conference.

All the agreements, except those dealing directly with the limitation of armament, take the place of various bilateral or multipower treaties, arrangements, or understandings, formal or informal, with reference to matters in which all of the powers signatory were, if not equally, at least essentially concerned.

All the powers came to the conference for the purpose of dealing with a series of present, practical situations affecting their international relations and calling for adjustment; they had a mutual interest and incentive for reaching a common understanding and working arrangement as to all of them. They accordingly applied themselves to the finding of a way to meet those situations and were happily able to come to agreements mutually satisfactory concerning them. I shall not perhaps be far afield in saying that this consideration and disposition of actualities affecting the lives of nations, as distinguished from an attempt to legislate for nonexistent world idealities, is perhaps the characteristic element of these engagements. The powers have taken the world as they found it in fact, and then have dealt with the fact in the necessary aspects to the end that the welfare and happiness of mankind and the peace of the world might be advanced.

Furthermore, the powers concerned did not consort together for the purpose of forcibly dispossessing any power of any right or property which it had theretofore claimed or possessed. As it has worked out, all the powers assembled have in fact given up certain rights which they had, and others have relinquished certain rights or prerogatives which they asserted; but all have surrendered such rights willingly, without pressure or constraint, and with the maximum of good feeling and neighborliness.

Again, this conference did not aim its deliberations against any power or group of powers. It had no punishments to inflict, no rewards to bestow. Mutual consideration and advancement and the general welfare and peace of the whole world have been its guiding principles. The conclusions come to neither require nor contemplate any compulsory measures against any power in the world, signatory or nonsignatory. The offerings made were free-will; their observance is to be likewise.

It thus comes that the measures concerted at the conference, the conclusions embodied in these treaties, leave no power despoiled. The powers left the conference possessed of every right, enjoying every power, which was theirs when they came, save only those they willingly and gladly gave up for the general good. They thus are more firmly united, more strongly willed for right and justice in international relations, stauncher friends and neighbors, with keener and more sympathetic mutual understandings, than ever before. The spirit of sacrifice which has flowed in and through the conference leaves the world a safer and better place in which to live.

Thus the elements out of which has been built the treaty fabric are mutual and essential interests affecting the welfare and peace of the nations concerned and of the world, actual problems calling for solution, unconstrained relinquishment of rights or prerogatives by equal to equal, there being no enemy to be punished or friend to be rewarded, no compulsory measures of enforcement, no power despoiled—surely these are the elements to which we have a right to look and upon which we must depend for further progress in world righteousness. Take away any of them and the result, whatever it may be, will be of questionable effectiveness and may be of doubtful morality. While man is what he is, it is difficult to see how nations can ever associate themselves together and work in harmony except upon these great elemental bases.

And may I be allowed here a word of admonition? It will not do for us to think these treaties may be dismissed with the contemptuous smirk that being merely treaties they mean nothing, are made only to be broken, that they are valueless. This is the doctrine of despair and must not be propagated. For what, I ask you, is the alternative? If nations may not establish by mutual undertaking the rules and principles by which they are to be governed, if the sovereign plighted faith of mighty peoples is hereafter to be freely and without censure flouted, if, in short, nations may not trust one another, then, I say to you, the world is lost. Because the alternative to life under free, common understanding, with mutual trust and forbearance, in an association of recognized, unconstrained peers, is domination by one or by few under such a rule of brute force as will plunge the world into chaos and threaten humanity with oblivion. No; we may not cast aside these treaties as mere idle words, under penalty of being overwhelmed by the outburst of righteous condemnation from all the peoples of the world.

It can not be denied that the great fundamentals to which I have just referred materially narrow the field of international endeavor which, looking only to the frailties and needs of mankind, we fain would cover when nations negotiate together; but the limitations I have named are inevitably incident to the present and all other wisely conceived international arrangements, and arrangements of any other sort hinder rather than help the true progress of civilization. The nations of the earth have not in the past and can not in future find progress and peace in any other association together than that which shall administer to actual needs; shall adjust actual and not artificial disparities and conditions; shall recognize to the full the existing deep fundamental laws which have always governed and controlled the growth and development of societies and nations; and shall provide always for the building of a stable and lasting peace founded on common consent, order, law, justice, and reality.

It is the absence of these elements that has strewn the past with dead endeavors for some effective world organization of the nations, as a brief survey will show.

The primary "Great Design"—Memoirs of the Duke of Sully, Lennox translation (1810 ed. vol. v, pp. 78–118, inclusive)—conceived seemingly by Queen Elizabeth and elaborated and perfected by Henry of France—the Grand Monarch—failed because it lacked a part of these great elements. This "Design" provided for an association of the nations, for the creation, by arbitrary readjustment, of a new Europe with constituent States set up and bounded as seemed wisest to the author of the "Design," for the expulsion of the infidel from Europe, for the taking of the possessions of one nation and the bestowal thereof upon another, for the creation of a body of laws, ordinances, and engagements for the government of the new world created by the "Design," for the establishment of a great international senate to legislate for the nations in their international relations and to adjust the differences arising between them, for the setting up of tribunals inferior to the senate and with appeals thereto, and for establishment of an international army and navy to enforce the mandates of the senate. Thus the "Great Design" of Elizabeth and Henry has been the parent of all similar plans since born. It failed because it aimed at coercing the consciences of men, at the forcible spoliation of nations, at the creation of an artificial status among the peoples of the earth, at the curtailment particularly of one great power without its consent. The good of the "Design," and it had good, was so fouled by the evil which lay all through it that the master of our destinies refused his consent to its imposition upon men.

The first great successor of this plan to be tried upon the world—the Holy Alliance—came 200 years later (Phillips—Confederation of Europe, p. 19). Consciously framed by the visionary Alexander of Russia to accomplish, as it would seem, the great purposes sought through the "Great Design," it also was in fact aimed primarily at the overthrow of a single nation. Couched in language benedictory in its loftiness, the Holy Alliance devoted its actual energies and powers toward unholy ends, and largely by the action of our own great country, it fell. It had endangered freedom of conscience, it had sought to perpetuate tyranny and to trample upon human liberty.

Recently the principles and provisions of the "Great Design" were rediscovered, and an attempt was made to impose them upon the nations and to set up a world government. Like the "Great Design" and the Holy Alliance, this plan also was primarily aimed against one great power; it also attempted a redistribution of Europe in the manner which seemed best to its proponents—setting up and pulling down nations; it also dealt with idealities not realities; it also was to impose its will upon powers in disfavor; it also would—if its proponents prevailed—coerce the consciences of men, this time politically. Looking to the past, can we doubt the fate which must await every effort that has lying at its base these fatal defects, and which wants those fundamentals I have already pointed out as indispensable to the establishment of a workable association of nations?

But is it too much to hope that hereafter and out of our present efforts, enlightened and fortified as they may be by the experiences of the past, we may find it possible in a future not too remote to make further practical advance toward a further association of the nations as to matters beneficent to humanity?

The treaties which the President has laid before us are six in number. None of them contain matters new to our diplomacy; they are but the renewed application of principles that are already well-grounded in our recognized foreign policies.

I shall take first—as I have already stated—the treaty signed by the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, pledging mutual respect for their rights in the Far East.

The waters of the Pacific are not strange seas to the people of the United States, nor are its farther shores new and unknown lands to our citizens.

Hardly had our national existence been secured and recognized before the vigorous, youthful merchant marine of our country thrust its prows into the Pacific (Moore's International Relations of the Chinese Empire, 1910 ed., vol. 1, p. 58) and opened up with the Far East an American trade which within a few years shared with Great Britain the great bulk of the commerce of that part of the world. This trade continued to increase in amount and importance, till, following the treaty of Nanking of 1842 between Great Britain and China, which opened the "treaty ports," we negotiated our first treaty with China in 1844 (Moore's International Relations of the Chinese Empire, 1910 ed., vol. 1, pp. 323, 342, 343), and our merchants threw into the eastern trade their famous clipper ships, which enabled us by 1852 to acquire almost half of the trade of Shanghai and a large part of the trade of other treaty ports.

In 1854 we made our first treaty with Japan, which opened our trade with that country, and it is a source of gratification to all Americans that this great people with whom we were the first to come in direct and intimate contact have developed into the mighty nation they have now become. It is a matter of good augury that between us there has existed during this entire period an unbroken peace, which it is hoped that the treaties now before us shall make perpetual.

Since the middle of the last century our trade with the Orient has gradually expanded, until it now covers the entire East and the continents and islands of Oceania.

Our territorial expansion toward and in the Pacific has at least kept pace with our trade.

In 1792 our adventurous citizens made discoveries under which we became possessed of the regions of the Columbia River and Puget Sound. In 1803 we acquired through the Louisiana Purchase from France a vast expanse of territory which lay beyond our then western boundary and which brought us to the Rocky Mountains. In 1819 we confirmed by purchase from Spain a title to the region south of the Columbia, where we had already made settlements in 1811. In 1848 Mexico ceded to us another mighty empire, which carried our land through to the waters of the Pacific and filled out our entire western main coast line south of Canada. In 1867 we obtained by purchase from Russia the great Territory of Alaska, which still more greatly extended our shores and first carried our possessions on the north into the Eastern Hemisphere.

But moved by the influences of a rapidly expanding commerce we had long before this time begun to manifest an exclusive interest in islands of the mid-Pacific. As early as 1820 we had appointed to reside in the Hawaiian Islands "an agent of the United States for commerce and seamen." (Moore's Digest, p. 475.) Six years later we negotiated with the Hawaiian King the first treaty ever negotiated by Hawaii with a representative of a foreign power. (Moore's Digest, p. 476.) Following intimations made in 1848 (Moore's Digest, pp. 477–479) by Mr. Buchanan, the Secretary of State, the great Webster in 1851 declared that, as to Hawaii, the policy of the United States was that it—> can never consent to see those islands taken possession of by either of the great commercial powers of Europe, nor can it consent that demands manifestly unjust and derogatory and inconsistent with a bona fide independence shall be enforced against that Government.

But the common interests of the United States and Hawaii, the close trade relationship between the two countries, and their territorial propinquity which led us to speak of them as "an outpost fronting and commanding the whole of our possessions on the Pacific Ocean" (Moore's Digest, I, p. 484), "an outpost of American commerce" (Moore's Digest, I, p. 491), "the predominance of our interest in the regions of these islands" (Moore's Digest, I, p. 493), the emigration of American citizens to and settlement in Hawaii, and, finally, the conviction that the "possession of these islands by a great maritime power (Moore's Digest, p. 481) would be a positive threat to interests too large and important to be lightly risked" (Moore's Digest, I, p. 486), all combined to bring about a result which was inevitable from the first. Accordingly after an abortive effort at annexation in 1893 (Moore's Digest, I, p. 497) the islands finally were added to the possessions of the United States in 1898 (Moore's Digest, I, p. 503). Thus we pushed our holdings into mid-Pacific.

Nor did the maritime affluence and paramountcy that were ours before the Civil War permit us to confine our interests to northern and central Pacific waters. We went also to the South Seas.

In 1853 we placed a commercial agent at Apia, in Samoa (Moore's Digest, p. 536). In 1872 we entered into an agreement (never ratified) with Maunga, great chief of the Bay of Pago-Pago (Moore's Digest, p. 475), in the island of Tutuila, under which we obtained the exclusive privilege of establishing in that harbor a naval station for the use and convenience of United States Government vessels (Moore's Digest, p. 537). At about this time the attention of the President of the United States was directed "to the importance of the growing trade and commerce of the United States with the islands in the South Pacific Ocean and to the opportunities of increasing our commercial relations in that quarter of the globe" (Moore's Digest, p. 537). The stipulations of the unperfected agreement of 1872 were incorporated in the treaty of 1878 (Malloy's Treaties, II, 5, 1575), which contained also this significant provision, to which I call special attention:

> If, unhappily, any differences should have arisen or shall hereafter arise between the Samoan Government and any other Government in amity with the United States, the Government of the latter will employ its good offices for the purpose of adjusting these differences upon a satisfactory and solid foundation.

The mediatory rôle which we thus assumed was immediately given point by the conclusion by Samoa of a treaty with Germany conveying rights for a naval station, and with Great Britain for a naval station and coaling depot (Moore's Digest, I, p. 539).

It is unnecessary to detail the rather tumultuous history of Samoa during the next few years, which was perhaps the inevitable result of the peculiar situation in which Samoa's treaties with the various powers left her. By 1889 it was clear the obligation to mediate which we had undertaken in 1878 was insufficient to safeguard Samoa, and in an effort to meet the existing situation we, with Germany and Great Britain, entered into a general act for the neutrality of the Samoan Government (Malloy's Treaties, p. 1574). This was our first national experience in joint international politics, and Secretary Gresham thought it "made the first departure from our traditional and well-established policy of avoiding entangling alliances with foreign powers in relation to objects remote from this hemisphere" (Moore's Digest, I, p. 549). But our joint plan for neutralizing Samoa succeeded no better than had the mediating plan to which we alone were parties, and accordingly in 1899 the islands were divided among the three powers (Malloy's Treaties, p. 1595).

Thus we pushed our possessions into the region of the South Seas.

The results of the War with Spain in 1898 devolved upon us still further possessions in the Southern Hemisphere of the Far East. The Philippines, with their considerable areas, population, trade, and resources, came to us, and we secured the far-flung bit of land called Guam. By all this we have become territorially interested almost in the center of the Far East, and possess there a domain that is exceeded by few powers.

These expanding territorial interests have brought home to us our intimate relationship to all questions affecting the peace and development of the Far East, and have shown us that as to these possessions we are all but as vitally concerned in the happenings and developments in that region as we are with the course of events in this hemisphere, which affect the order about our homeland. We do not enter the far eastern situation as quixotic busybodies.

Always sympathetic with China and for the Chinese people, and desirous that peace should prevail in those regions, we entered into a treaty (1882) with Korea (over which China claimed suzerainty), by which we agreed that—

> If other powers deal unjustly or oppressively with either Government, the other will exert their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their friendly feelings. (Malloy's Treaties, p. 335.)

Thus we again assumed in the Far East a mediatory rôle.

Nearly two decades after this, when the dismemberment of China seemed to have moved within the range of probability, the United States sought for and secured from the various powers interested a declaration of adherence to the so-called "open-door" policy. (MacMurray's Treaties, p. 221.) This, like the action in Samoa, involved us in understandings with other powers regarding the status of the Far East.

In 1908, some differences having arisen between the United States and Japan, notes were formally exchanged between the Secretary of State, Mr. Root, and the Japanese ambassador, Mr. Takahira, the important parts of which read:

> 1. It is the wish of the two Governments to encourage the free and peaceful development of their commerce on the Pacific Ocean.
> 2. The policy of both Governments, uninfluenced by any aggressive tendencies, is directed to the maintenance of the existing status quo in the region above mentioned, and to the defense of the principle of equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China.
> 3. They are accordingly firmly resolved reciprocally to respect the territorial possessions belonging to each other in said region.
> 4. They are also determined to preserve the common interests of all powers in China by supporting by all pacific means at their disposal the independence and integrity of China and the principle of equal opportunity for commerce and industry of all nations in that empire.
> 5. Should any event occur threatening the status quo as above described, or the principle of equal opportunity as above defined, it remains for the two Governments to communicate with each other in order to arrive at an understanding as to what measures they may consider it useful to take. (MacMurray's Treaties, p. 769.)

So for the third time we entered into a joint understanding regarding the affairs of the Far East.

In 1909 the United States made a further effort to bring among the powers interested in the Far East good understandings and mutual renunciations of interests inimical to the integrity of China by proposing the neutralization of the Manchurian railways by the powers interested therein. For reasons which need not be recounted here this effort failed.

Thus our present interposition in trans-Pacific affairs is not a new venture for the United States. We do but follow the course upon which we entered more than half a century ago. And our present proposed commitments are not different in character nor of materially greater extent than those we have undertaken in the past.

We covet the possessions of no one in the Far East; the lessons taught us by our own past experiences, as also by the experiences of others, abundantly persuade us we want no further or greater territorial or government responsibilities there; we wish only the opportunity to develop in that region our trade and commerce peacefully and on an equality with others, and with them to share the great markets which in the future that part of the world will afford.

Entertaining these views, is there, can there be, any reason why we should not make a declaration, an engagement, to respect the territories of others in the Far East and thus quiet in the minds of certain powers an apprehension the existence of which seems too well vouched to allow us wisely to ignore it? On the other hand, it would be but blind folly to deny or to fail to appreciate that certain of our own citizens are not convinced of the disinterest of certain powers in the possessions of the United States in Asia. Surely it is wise to calm the feelings of these citizens by taking the pledged assurance of these powers that they will in turn respect our possessions in the Far East.

To remove this mutual apprehension of territorial greed by the one in the other, an apprehension of the kind which, since history began, has been one of the most fruitful causes of war between nations, must command the approval of all right-minded loyal citizens, because it stabilizes a peace we all cherish and for breaking which there is not the shadow of a real excuse or reason.

What have we lost, what can we lose by this declaration to respect the rights of others? Has this touched our liberties, our institutions, our independence, or our sovereignty? Have we less of any of these than before? Have our professions, past and present, of altruistic ideals toward the peoples of the world, of consideration for the rights of others, of great self-denial in the use of tremendous power, been idle boasts or smug disclaimers to deceive the world of our true intentions? If we have been honest in the past, as I know we have, then what have we lost by agreeing to do that which in any event we had intended to do?

On the other hand, if the plighted word of sovereign powers has not lost all virtue, have we not gained in security for our possessions and freed their peoples from the dangers of absorption by other powers? Have we not added to our own peace of mind and to fellowship and good, neighborly understanding with those who live about us by receiving the solemn assurance of our neighbors in the East that they will respect our rights in that region? Instead of threatening, injuring, or impairing our liberties, free institutions, independence, or sovereignty, this treaty adds to the security of all of them.

The consummation of this mutual agreement alone would have justified the calling of the conference.

It thus must be that no valid objection can be made to the first paragraph of the so-called four-power treaty, which pledges the contracting powers as among themselves—> to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

It is, indeed, but a reaffirmation of the principle which, formally declared more than a decade ago, has governed for that period the relations between the United States and Japan, and which has subsisted between Great Britain and Japan for twice that period.

In view of certain criticisms which have already been heard, I may with propriety repeat here the language of article 10 of the League of Nations covenant. The two need only to be placed side by side to make their fundamental differences entirely obvious. Article 10 reads in its first sentence:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

The second paragraph of article 1 of this treaty provides that—

> If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

I must in the first place observe that there is in the treaty before us no provision for force by one against the others or by the others against the one; there is here not even a covert threat of force. Force is not in this provision, explicitly or implicitly, either in the foreground or in the background. There is here only an undertaking of and among friends to talk over controversies and adjust them in a spirit of amity and brotherhood.

The eagerly responsive imagination of Polonius may see in it shapes and attributes it does not possess.

> HAMLET. Do you see yonder cloud that's almost in shape of a camel?
> POLONIUS. By the mass, and 'tis like a camel, indeed.
> HAMLET. Methinks it's like a weasel.
> POLONIUS. It is backed like a weasel.
> HAMLET. Or like a whale?
> POLONIUS. Very like a whale.

Place this provision as high as you wish and it can not go beyond a stipulation for obligatory arbitration, or its equivalent, of all controversies arising out of any Pacific question and affecting the rights of the parties in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean. Surely our conduct in the past and our professions at present as to the peaceful adjustment of international disputes will not permit us to falter at this step now proposed.

One of the proudest achievements of our whole history is our early espousal of and our subsequent fidelity to this principle of the peaceful adjustment of international disputes. When more than a century and a quarter ago troubles arose between us and the mother country, who had but recently recognized our independence, we negotiated with her a treaty under which we settled by arbitration our then existing difficulties. From that great precedent on until the present moment, this method of composing differences between America and other peoples has been a fundamental principle of our foreign policy.

It would be a long and I am sure an unnecessary task to follow the details of the history of our arbitrations, but we may with profit refresh at this time our memories as to the scope we have given this principle of adjustment in our international affairs. It is well we should recall the past that, advised of what we have done, we may press constantly forward. Great mistakes grow sometimes from want of information. We have arbitrated with more than 30 different countries the claims of our citizens for injuries inflicted upon either their persons or their properties through the illegal acts of the authorities of these countries. We have in turn answered in damages to the citizens of other countries for the results of unlawful acts upon the part of our own officers, State or National.

These adjudications cover almost an infinitude of circumstances. We have submitted to arbitration the far-reaching, sovereignty-touching question as to whether or not we have conducted our belligerent operations in accordance with the laws of war. We have invoked the judgment of international tribunals as to whether we have fulfilled our obligations under treaties, and have done this even where it involved the question of our rights on the high seas. (Fur-seal arbitration.)

We have intrusted to such tribunals the questions of the neutral or unneutral conduct of a neutral toward ourselves as a belligerent in respect of matters involving the honor of both ourselves and the other country, and have done this when the tempers of both peoples were so aroused as to threaten to engulf our two mighty nations in a fratricidal war. (Geneva arbitration relative to Alabama claims.)

We have called for the opinion of an unbiased international tribunal upon the question as to whether the judgments of our own Supreme Court—the most powerful court in Christendom—were in accord with the applicable and controlling rules and principles of international law. (Spring-bok and other cases concerning questions of seizure by United States of British vessels during the Civil War.)

We have appealed to such a tribunal for determination as to whether or not certain military operations we had conducted were warranted or unwarranted under all the attending circumstances, a question involving the propriety of our exercise of the most fundamental attribute of our sovereignty. (Arbitration of Civil War claims of Great Britain and other powers; also of Cuba and Philippines during the Spanish War, but particularly our Samoan arbitrations.)

We have adjusted in large part our northern boundaries and a considerable part of our southern boundaries, land and water, by the same method and have thereby lost this same claimed territory of our homeland.

Finally we have sought and obeyed the decisions of international tribunals as to our ownership of territory forming by proximity and asserted claim an integral portion of our own homeland, even where that decision required us to relinquish title to what we had honestly believed to belong to us. (Jay treaty with Great Britain arbitrating Canadian boundary, and subsequent arbitration of practically the entire Canadian boundary through to Lake of the Woods. Shanizal tract arbitration on southern boundary and adjustment of Rio Grande boundary.)

Shall we, Mr. President, now turn our backs upon this glorious record of effort to sustain the peace of the world, or shall we hesitate and stop when righteousness and destiny bid us go further along that course of civilization, progress, and humanity which we have ourselves marked out? What question could arise under the treaty before us which would be more vital to our interests, more nearly affect our independence, reach more closely to our honor than those which we have already intrusted to international tribunals for adjustment? I can think of but one class of questions which might arise and which we have not in the past arbitrated, and that class would include those matters which affect our internal or domestic affairs. But as to this class the contracting powers on signing the agreement joined in a declaration that—

> The controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which according to principles of international law lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

Surely there is nothing in this provision of the treaty which the stanchest patriot, the patriot most apprehensive for the maintenance of our national honor, integrity, independence, and free institutions—and I count myself among these—need to fear or to condemn.

But there is another consideration to which I feel I must direct attention. The arbitrations of the past to which I have referred as involving principles of vital import to our existence have primarily and in almost every instance affected immediately our own homeland or its adjacent seas. But under this treaty it is not possible for any matter involving our mainland or its neighboring waters to be called in question. This treaty relates to our "insular possessions * * * in the region of the Pacific," not to the United States proper nor to Alaska nor Hawaii nor to any of our possessions in the region of the Caribbean, and no question involving these latter can arise under the treaty. Therefore if we have in the past repeatedly arbitrated matters affecting directly these Territories, the homeland and its approaches, it can not be we shall find difficulty in agreeing to adjust in a similar manner questions of like import and affecting our rights in regions so remote as to render any decision concerning them without any direct effect upon the safety or security of the home territory and its environs.

I pass now to the second article of the treaty, which provides that—

> If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the situation.

Comment already aimed at this provision might induce a belief in the minds of some of our citizens that this provision creates an aggressive military alliance among the powers signatory. But I wish to emphasize that it is not an alliance in any heretofore accepted meaning of the word, and that if it were an alliance in fact, if it were an alliance in effect, if it were an alliance in contemplation, and, furthermore, if it was not clearly understood by all the powers party to it that it was none of these, I should not venture to propose to this body that it advise and consent to its ratification. The men of intelligence and discretion in our Nation who pronounce it an alliance can not have carefully and impartially examined it, because the passing years of our history have demonstrated nothing more clearly than that the warning of Washington against entangling alliances was conceived of a lofty patriotism and inspired wisdom rarely vouched for the guidance of a people; and from the safe path so marked by the immortal founders, I shall be the last willingly and knowingly to stray. No matter what form the suggestion may take, no matter how alluring the prospect held out shall be, we shall have with my consent no entangling alliances. Thus far in our history it has been possible to exert to the full our beneficent influence and to extend to their utmost our philanthropies among the peoples of the earth without the necessity and in the absence of all such alliances; and I perceive in the present situation of the world nothing that calls for the abandonment of our traditional position in order to continue to exercise the maximum of good in the future.

Another species of criticism, sometimes disguised as faint praise, is that this is but an imitation of the covenant of the League of Nations and specifically of article 10 of that instrument. This suggestion is equally unfounded with the first.

I wish to make now, regarding this provision of the treaty, a few observations which will, in my judgment, meet both these points of objection.

In the first place, the subject matter of this provision, as to which the powers enter into undertakings relates only to "their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific." It is to be observed in the first instance that each and all of the powers are mutually interested and concerned with reference to the disturbance of any of their described "rights" in the Far East. None of these "rights" of any one of the parties could be materially altered or affected without the influence being felt for good or ill by all the others. This obligation, therefore, relates only to matters in which we are intimately concerned and in the adjustment of which we have a selfish interest.

The provision has nothing whatever to do with the homeland of France, Great Britain, or the United States, nor with their environs, nor with their possessions in any other region than the Pacific. Therefore, whatever may be the extent of the obligation here imposed, and I shall discuss that later, it relates only to this one region, and disturbances arising in other regions, whatever their cause, can not fall within the purview of this treaty obligation. It is to be further observed that the provision relates to the "rights" of the powers in their insular possessions and insular dominions; there is here nothing that has to do with the political relationships of a country to its possessions.

In contrast to this, the provisions of article 10 of the league covenant covered "the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league." This provision was therefore of world-wide application, not restricted to one particular area. Moreover, the homelands of all members of the league were as intimately concerned, were as clearly within the purview of the treaty as were any other portions of the world. Whatever the rights, the duties, the powers, the obligations which were involved in this article they would have covered, if we had entered the league, the ground on which we stand as fully as they covered any other part of our national domain. Moreover, being thus world-wide in its application, article 10 related to and (if accepted by us) would have involved us in matters in which we had not the remotest concern, except only the interest which arose from the obligations we would have assumed under the covenant. We were thus to be thrust into every quarrel wherever originating and whatever its relation. Again, the phrase "existing political independence" of article 10 is pregnant with an infinity of dire possibilities as to its application. Does it cover the political relations between the mother country and the colonies; does it embrace the political status of the homeland itself; does it prevent evolution in political systems anywhere; does it curtail the progress of human liberty and free institutions? All these matters, vital to the perpetuation and development of our civilization, are left in ominous obscurity by this provision.

The treaty before us has none of this; it stands free of political significance or threat. So much then for the subject matter of the treaty.

I pass now to the nature of the undertaking of the treaty before us. It is in the first place directed against the "aggressive action of any other power." That is, this article is directed against powers stranger to this treaty, and whatever its sanctions are they apply only to such powers; they do not concern the contracting powers themselves for they may not be invoked against them. If any such action should come from any of the powers themselves, it must be settled by the methods already described and provided in article 1, that is, by friendly, neighborly discussion and adjustment; such a controversy among the powers who contract here is entirely outside the purview of this article. This is not a union of any of the powers against the others of the powers; they have dealt on the basis of continuing friends, not of potential enemies, and agreement could not have been reached on any other basis.

But the league covenant was wholly different. It was a combination of the members even against their own members. This indeed is one of the great iniquities of that instrument, it constitutes the nations in it in an alliance, not alone against stranger powers but against the erring constituent members themselves.

I pass now to the obligation itself as undertaken in the present treaty. The language used is that "the high contracting powers shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding." Surely an obligation to discuss with other friendly powers concerned, a matter of mutual concern to all, is not and can not be considered as a military alliance. We have had for a decade an obligation with Japan couched in practically identical language and yet no one has heretofore suggested that this constituted, nor has it proved to be, anything resembling an alliance. The language of the Root-Takahira agreement in its paragraph No. 5 asserted that—

> Should any event occur threatening the status quo as above described or the principle of equal opportunity as above defined, it remains for the two Governments to communicate with each other in order to arrive at an understanding as to what measures they may consider it useful to take.

Certainly during the 10 years of its existence this has led us into no trouble, no embroilment, no operations under a military alliance, as is shown by the fact that we have had none of these that was even remotely connected with this undertaking. It is true that the Root-Takahira agreement was not a treaty, and that therefore the obligation imposed upon us by it was not of that binding character which is imposed by treaty. But obviously the character, the extent of the undertaking is not the same thing as the occasion calling for its performance, and I am here speaking of the occasion that calls the undertaking into life. Nor indeed does the laxity of an undertaking mean generally that situations calling for its operation will be less frequent than under a more stringent obligation.

I anticipate with confidence that the very existence of this undertaking for full and frank discussion and communication will make less frequent if not, indeed, entirely obviate the occasions for its use.

In this connection we may recall that under the league the parties did not agree themselves to consult together in relation merely to matters in which they were mutually concerned, but they agreed to refer to the council of the league—not to themselves—controversies and difficulties in which they had no concern whatever, and this council, not the powers immediately concerned and mutually interested, was to decide upon the course to be followed.

Finally I come to the sanction of this part of the treaty now before us. It is that the contracting powers shall communicate freely "in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the situation."

I may first observe again that the situation about which the powers are to communicate is one in which they are all concerned. In the next place the powers concerned, and only those powers, consult together. In the third place they consult regarding the "measures" to be taken, jointly or severally, to meet the exigencies of the situation. But they are not committed beforehand—and this is the vital point—to any definite measures, nor are they either committed or under any obligation to concert any measures at all. That is to say, if and when a prescribed aggressive action were taken by any stranger power the United States felt that its own interests were not put in jeopardy or that the threat to the other powers was not real or that the peace of the world and the welfare of its peoples would be best served by inaction there is no obligation here that we should counsel, consent to, or participate in the measures which any other power might propose as necessary. In other words, there is here not the slightest surrender of our independence of action; we have here no impairment of our sovereignty. Under these circumstances it is obvious that if at any time in the future circumstances should arise that led to the invoking by any power or powers of provisions of this article we should communicate with the other powers parties to this agreement, in full possession of a complete freedom of action, unconstrained by any treaty obligation, legal or moral, to take any measures at all, or believing some measures necessary, to adopt any which we did not at the time deem expedient and indispensable. We should enter and participate in such a conference uncommitted and with full and complete right to function in the emergency then before us in strict accordance with our due constitutional order. So that if the exigencies of the situation finally appeared to require the use of armed force we might face the question uncompromised, free, and unfettered to do the thing that then seemed wisest and best, for there is not in this treaty, nor arising from it, any obligation whatever to proceed to this extremity unless and until Congress, in the due exercise of its high constitutional, sovereign prerogative had fully debated the situation, reached its decision, and formally authorized the waging of war. Is this not the crux of the whole matter, and does it not destroy every vestige of legitimate objection to the treaty?

Furthermore, as we are an eminently practical people, may I not ask a blunt question? With the United States, Great Britain, France, and Japan bound by treaty oath to respect their mutual rights in the Far East, which is the nation outside the concord strong enough to challenge their potential power by aggressive action in the Far East and so make necessary the invocation of the sanctions of this article of the treaty?

We may be permitted to observe that the situation existing under the league is wholly different. The members are obligated to "preserve * * * the territorial integrity and existing independence of the members of the league," no matter in what part of the world the threat may arise and without regard to the fact that threat arising might relate to matters in which the particular member had no concern whatever. In the next place, the decision as to what should be done is not to be determined by the interested powers themselves, sitting together, but by an extraneous body in which would sit powers who might be without interest yet whose voice would carry as much weight to the decision as that of any party directly involved. In the third place this extraneous body would decide the means to be taken to secure the "preservation" of the threatened territorial integrity or independence. Furthermore, if there were measures to be taken against a member under article 16 there would be an obligation, perfect in its form and operative without any further action by any member of the league, to subject the offending power to—the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State whether a member of the league or not.

Moreover, in such case—

The members of the league agree further that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the members of the league which are cooperating to protect the covenants of the league.

In addition to all this, the council is to work out the contribution which each power ought to make, and is under a moral obligation to make, in the military operations contemplated by the council, which, through its permanent military commission, the council might, indeed, have directed the actual military operations themselves.

And all these obligations could be imposed not only to situations in which we had no direct concern but also as to measures of which we might positively disapprove.

Those who see in the cooperative spirit of the present treaty, with its retention of full freedom of action for each and all the powers party thereto when the exigency arises, any resemblance to the drastic, compulsory provisions of the covenant of the league either have read blindly or, at least, without a proper understanding.

This provision, its enemies to the contrary notwithstanding, was not germinated from the covenant of the League of Nations, to which in substance it bears not even a superficial resemblance, but from principles already long fixed in our active foreign policy when the plan of the league first cast its evil shadows in the minds that rediscovered that old and abandoned system.

Thus we came to have with respect to a region in which we have extensive interests, and in reference to great territories of which we are possessed, an agreement among powers actually interested in that region—those powers who alone ought to determine matters vitally affecting it—which contains all the advantages and safeguards, all the inherent guaranties of peace, all the blessings for the peoples concerned, which the covenant of the league has been erroneously declared to afford, without any of the pitfalls, entanglements, and sovereignty-impairing provisions of that instrument.

And it should be further understood that the inevitable effect of our failure to ratify this treaty will be to revive and perpetuate the Anglo-Japanese alliance. There can be nothing more important to this country than the substitution of this engagement for that compact. We can not attach too much importance to this. It should be apparent to all who will give it a moment's thought.

I can not conceive of more fitting language with which to close this presentation of my case than to quote from the address made by the President when he presented the treaties to this body, to the effect that "nothing in any of these treaties commits the United States, or any other power, to any kind of an alliance, entanglement, or involvement. * * * There is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no written or moral obligation to join in defense, no expressed or implied commitment to arrive at any agreement except in accordance with our constitutional methods. * * * If nations may not safely agree to respect each other's rights, and may not agree to confer if one party to the compact threatens trespass, or may not agree to advise if one party to the pact is threatened by an outside power, then all concerted efforts to tranquilize the world and stabilize peace must be flung to the winds."

Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I merely wish to say a few words on the resolution proposing to amend the rules of the Senate, but I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts if he desires the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I desire that the Senate shall resume the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am about to make a motion that the Senate return to legislative session in order to proceed with the consideration of the proposed amendment of the rules, which we have agreed to vote upon to-day at 4 o'clock. Before doing so, however, I wish to say that it is my intention on to-morrow to ask that the four-power treaty be taken up at the beginning of the session, and I desire that it shall be kept before the Senate. I have no desire to press it unduly, for I realize the importance of full debate upon it, and I should dislike extremely to be compelled to ask the Senate to resort to long hours or any other means of pressing for a result. I hope, however, that the Senate will debate the treaty as fully and as rapidly as may be. I now make the motion that the Senate resume its legislative session.

The motion was agreed to.

CELEBRATION OF BRAZILIAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Foreign Relations a joint resolution and a bill. They are unanimous reports, and I think there can be no objection to the consideration and passage of either measure. I should be very glad if the Senator from Alabama would let me ask unanimous consent to report them and have them immediately considered. If they give rise to any debate I shall withdraw them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations, I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 173) authorizing the President to appoint a commission to represent the Government of the United States at the centennial celebration of the independence of Brazil, to be held at Rio de Janeiro in September next, and I submit a report (No. 531) thereon.

I will say, Mr. President, that I can explain the joint resolution in a few words. It involves no expenditure of money, but simply authorizes the President to take what money is necessary for the purpose from the million dollars which have already been appropriated for the participation of the United States in the exposition to be held at Rio de Janeiro.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the joint resolution be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Government of Brazil has invited the Government of the United States to be represented at the centennial celebration of the independence of Brazil, to be held in September next at Rio de Janeiro: Be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized to apopint and send to Brizil a commission not to exceed five members to represent the Government of the United States at the said celebration.

SEC. 2. That the expenses of the said commission shall be paid, under the direction and subject to the approval of the Secretary of State, from the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the expenses of taking part in an international exposition to be held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, provided for in the act of Congress approved December 15, 1921, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRAVELING SALESMEN IN SOUTH AMERICAN COUNTRIES.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2716) to give effect to certain provisions of conventions with foreign Governments for the purpose of facilitating the work of traveling salesmen, and I submit a report (No. 530) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

I will say, by way of explanation, that we have entered into a series of treaties with some of the South American States for improving the arrangements for traveling salesmen throughout those countries, by eliminating local fees, duties, and so forth. This bill, simply in order to carry out those treaties, authorizes the State Department to issue certificates of identification to salesmen from the United States going to those countries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Whereas the United States has entered into conventions with the Governments of Uruguay, Guatemala, Salvador, Panama, and Venezuela, which were signed on August 27, 1918, December 3, 1918, January 28, 1919, February 8, 1919, and July 3, 1919, respectively, for facilitating the work of traveling selesmen; and

Whereas Articles I and II of each of said conventions read as follows:

"ARTICLE I. Manufacturers, merchants, and traders domiciled within the jurisdiction of one of the high contracting parties may operate as commercial travelers either personally or by means of agents or employees within the jurisdiction of the other high contracting party on obtaining from the latter, upon payment of a single fee, a license which shall be valid throughout its entire territorial jurisdiction.

"In case either of the high contracting parties shall be engaged in war it reserves to itself the right to prevent from operating within its jurisdiction under the provisions of this treaty, or otherwise, enemy nationals or other aliens whose presence it may consider prejudicial to public order and national safety.

"ART. II. In order to secure the license above mentioned the applicant must obtain from the country of domicile of the manufacturers, merchants, and traders represented a certificate attesting his character as commercial traveler. This certificate, which shall be issued by the authority to be designated in each country for the purpose, shall be visèed by the consul of the country in which the applicant proposes to operate, and the authorities of the latter shall, upon the presentation of such certificate, issue to the applicant the national license as provided in Article I."

Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce, or any person in the Department of Commerce designated by him, is hereby authorized to issue the licenses and certificates of identification which are provided for by the said Articles I and II, respectively, of the said conventions, or which may be provided for by similar articles in any convention or treaty that may hereafter be concluded by the United States with a foreign Government, and is further authorized to collect a reasonable fee for each license and certificate of identification issued. The amount of such fee shall be fixed by regulations made by the Secretary of Commerce and shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States quarterly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Alabama.

SPECIAL POSTAL CANCELING STAMPS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the House has passed five bills granting permission for the use of special postal canceling stamps in certain cities in connection with the celebrations or gatherings being held in such cities. The Senate has passed some of those bills and they have gone over to the House. The cities to which it is proposed to grant such permission are Richmond, Va.; Phoenix, Ariz.; Fayetteville, Ark.; Hutchinson, Kans.; and Pasadena, Calif.

From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 10161) to authorize the use of special canceling stamps in certain post offices. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. I understand that there can be no possible objection to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What does the bill provide?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It gives the postmasters of the cities where expositions or other celebrations are to be held, or whatever the occasion may be, the right to use extra canceling stamps without any expense to or additional burden upon the Government. We have frequently heretofore taken similar action. It merely relates to postal canceling stamps.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is the authority granted confined entirely to cases where expositions are being held?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; the bill is not confined to cities where expositions are being held, but to cities where there is some special occasion which is deemed of sufficient importance to allow the use of special canceling stamps.

Mr. KING. It is to advertise the towns.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the use of special canceling stamps as follows: In the Richmond, Va., post office, dies bearing the words and figures "Virginia Historical Pageant, Richmond, Va., May 22 to 28, 1922." In the Phoenix, Ariz., post office, dies bearing the words and figures "Visit Phoenix, Ariz., April 24–29, United States Good Roads Week." In the Fayetteville, Ark., post office, dies bearing the words and figures "Semicentennial, University of Arkansas, June 10–14, 1922 (50 years of service)." In the Hutchinson, Kans., post office, dies bearing the words and figures "Fiftieth Anniversary, Hutchinson and Reno County, Kansas State Fair, September 16–22, 1922." In the Pasadena, Calif., post office, dies bearing the words and figures "Fiftieth Anniversary, Pasadena, All the Year 1924": Provided, That no permit shall be granted for a longer period than six months.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the expenditure of any postal funds or appropriations either for the purchase of special dies or for furnishing or adapting canceling machines for the use of special dies.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether Hollywood, Calif., is included in this bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know what would be included in Pasadena, but I imagine that it is a suburb and might possibly be reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE LANSING-ISHII AGREEMENT.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama permit me to introduce a resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I offer a resolution to which I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If he desires it to go to the committee, I will consent that it go to the committee; otherwise, I should be glad to have it adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 251) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to advise the Senate as to the present status and binding effect of what is known as the Lansing-Ishii agreement between the United States and the Empire of Japan.

Secondly, as to whether or not the four-power pact, now before the Senate for consideration, if ratified, will abrogate, nullify, or in any way modify such agreement; and as to what will be the status of said agreement after the ratification of said four-power pact.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not want to discuss the resolution, except to say this, as I happen to be on my feet: It seems to me that anybody who will read the treaties that are now before the Senate in connection with the Lansing-Ishii agreement is bound to come to the conclusion that the Lansing-Ishii agreement or understanding has no further binding effect. The very terms of that understanding are wiped out by these treaties.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is a wide difference of opinion about that. I have been unable to ascertain that it was ever discussed at all by the delegation. If it has been, of course, I presume that this discussion will throw some light upon the meaning of the treaty. I thought perhaps by this resolution we might get the facts in reference to its consideration or discussion.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why does the Senator from Alabama say that by the terms of the four-power treaty the Lansing-Ishii agreement is expressly nullified? There is no reference to it in the four-power treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said by the treaties that were negotiated at the conference—not alone the four-power pact. The Lansing-Ishii note—it was not a treaty, but it was a note——

Mr. ROBINSON. It is referred to as a "note" or as an agreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. An agreement or an understanding—recognized certain spheres of interest. Of course, all questions of spheres of interest in the islands in the region of the Pacific are settled in the four-power treaty. The agreement that was made in reference to the general treaty recognizing the sovereignty and integrity of China, and other recognitions that were made at that time through the resolutions passed by the conference, in which it was agreed to remove the foreign post offices from China, and Japan agreed to it, in which it was agreed that the extraterritorial courts should be removed if after investigation conditions were found to be such as to warrant it, and so on—I can not go into all the details now—clearly and absolutely negative any idea that Japan should have any special influence in the affairs of China or the region of the Pacific by reason of contiguity of soil, and that was what the Lansing-Ishii note said.

Mr. KING. The note calls it "propinquity" instead of "contiguity."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I may not have used the right word, because I have not read the note for some months.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a brief statement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Lansing-Ishii agreement expressly reaffirmed the obligation of both the United States and Japan to regard the territorial integrity and political independence of China. At the same time it recognized that Japan had special interests in China; so that unless there is something in the treaties to which the Senator has referred which expressly revokes the Lansing-Ishii agreement in the particular that it recognized the alleged special interests of Japan in China or in certain territory in the Orient, I doubt whether those treaties would have the effect of revoking it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I disagree with the Senator. One of the reasons why I am for the four-power treaty is that I think it negatives the Lansing-Ishii note, because I am not in favor of recognizing that Japan or anybody else has any special interests in China by reason of nearness of soil.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was my understanding of the Senator's statement at first—that it was particularly the four-power treaty that impliedly revoked the Lansing-Ishii agreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not entirely, but it is one of the propositions. Of course, the four-power treaty does not relate to China proper.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly not, and therefore it could not rescind an understanding relating to Chinese territory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it does not; but it puts something else between the United States and Japan—a conference rather than a recognition of any special interest by reason of nearness of soil or territorial propinquity.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; in case of a controversy relating to insular rights or dominions among the four powers which are parties to the treaty they agree to get together and settle their differences, and in case of an act of aggression by any other power they agree to confer as to the best method of repelling that aggression; but I still can not see how that is inconsistent with the Lansing-Ishii agreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say that I think the general trend of the treaties—the four-power treaty is one; the general Chinese treaty is another—is all contrary to the idea that Japan has any special rights in connection with China, and negatives that idea. More than that, while I am not sure that I am right about this statement——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of Senators to the unanimous-consent agreement. I do not want to make any objection to this resolution, because I have none, but——

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but I think the unanimous-consent agreement will take him off the floor and take this resolution away from the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not intend to trespass on the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to say just one word more, while I am not sure I am right about this, I think if the Senator will examine the discussions in the far eastern committee he will find there some statements indicating that what I have said is so, and that it was said at the time of the adoption of the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator means as reported to the Senate in the document that has been printed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. I am not sure that I am right about that, but my recollection is that statements along that line were made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the four-power treaty provides in article 2 for a conference of the contracting powers only in case "the said rights"—that is, the rights in relation to the insular possessions and dominions of the powers—"are threatened"; not as to any continental matters.

Mr. ROBINSON. And it has no relation to any controversy growing out of China.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may we have the resolution disposed of now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MUSCLE SHOALS—PROPOSAL OF FREDERICK E. ENGSTRUM.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. President, I have before me the proposal made by Mr. Frederick E. Engstrum to the Secretary of War for the completion of the Muscle Shoals project. Mr. Engstrum is an eminent and prominent civil engineer who has been connected with many large industrial enterprises. This is a matter of public interest, and I ask unanimous consent that his proposal may be printed in the RECORD in the usual 8-point type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FEBRUARY 23, 1922.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I submit herewith amended proposal for the completion, lease, and operation of the Muscle Shoals project.

The declared policy of the United States as expressed in the national defense act of June 3, 1916, is to develop water power at the best location for the generation of electricity for the production of nitrates needed for the manufacture of fertilizer, and also to construct locks or lifts at such location as may be necessary for the improvement of navigation.

At that time, in the midst of war, the primary purpose was to make nitrates needed for explosives, while the making of the kind of nitrates needed for fertilizers and the improvement of navigation were of secondary importance.

To-day, in time of peace, the matter of primary importance is the making of the kind of nitrates needed for fertilizers. But to be prepared to make nitrates needed for munitions of war is still a matter of great importance, because the end of the supply of Chilean nitrates is already in sight, and, besides, the United States can not afford to be dependent upon any other country for an adequate supply of nitrates for explosives.

The Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army, in an official report to the Secretary of War on the advisability of completing the Muscle Shoals project in the interest of "nitrogen preparedness," under date of January 22, 1922, says:

NITROGEN PREPAREDNESS.

The main objective of the Ordnance Department in the matter of nitrogen compounds is to make the United States able to be self-sustaining in their supply in time of need. It believes that such ability can only be achieved through the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by one or more processes, and it further believes that the most economical and enduring method of developing nitrogen fixation is its establishment on a commercial basis.

Thus it is held that the development of nitrogen fixation from the air is now necessary as a measure of nitrate preparedness to keep the country self-sustaining in time of need, and that the best way to develop the nitrogen fixation process is its establishment on a commercial basis.

My proposal is designed to accomplish this very purpose and no other. I propose to devote the whole Muscle Shoals project to fixation of nitrogen from the air by the best-known process for making the best kind of nitrates needed for fertilizers and to keep in readiness the best-known process for making the kind of nitrates needed for explosives, and also to operate a research plant for the development of better processes for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. I also provide for the development of navigation at Muscle Shoals as fast as the power dams are completed.

The objects can now be obtained by the completion of Dam No. 2. The expenditure of the money necessary to build Dam No. 3 can not at this time be justified on any grounds. I agree, however, that when required to do so by the Government, to build Dam No. 3 and to lease and operate the same on the same terms as Dam No. 2; also to build storage reservoirs and other power plants when required by the growing needs for nitrates.

I submit that to accomplish the public purpose in view that the nitrate plants and the power to be developed should be leased to the same parties. The success of nitrate manufacture which can be economically used for fertilizer is dependent entirely on sale of power; without the support of the power development and sale of excess power to finance the nitrate plants it would not be possible to manufacture and sell such nitrates. The power end of the industry is to be solely developed for the benefit of the nitrate plants and fertilizer factory. The separation of such plants and factory from the power would destroy the unity and purpose of the industry.

The other outstanding features of my proposal may be summarized as follows:

1. The United States is not divested of title to any of its property, but retains ownership and preserves assets of approximately $143,000,000.

2. Returns from investment on a basis of 400,000-kilowatt gross development, under my lease will pay to the Government approximately three and a half million dollars per year for 50 years, or a total, at compound interest at 4 per cent, of approximately $537,000,000, which cash will be used to produce cheap nitrates for fertilizer or will be turned in to the Treasury at the option of the Government. This is a liberal return for investment of the Government to produce the indicated power.

3. I propose to devote the entire power development to the fixation of nitrogen from the air and to the manufacture of fertilizers, including the operation of a research plant for the development of the improved methods for the reduction of the cost of producing such nitrates.

4. The method proposed to finance, by the sale of excess power, the manufacture of nitrates is the only possible method by which nitrates can be produced under present known methods and sold to the American farmer at a price less than the Chilean products. The quantity of nitrates and fertilizers annually produced will be limited only by the amount of excess power sold and the price at which the nitrates may be sold.

Respectfully submitted.

FREDERICK E. ENGSTRUM.

PROPOSED CONTRACT FOR COMPLETION AND LEASE OF MUSCLE SHOALS.

(By Frederick E. Engstrum.)

1. PARTIES.

Memoranda of contract made this —— day of ———, 1922, by and between the Government of the United States, party of the first part and hereinafter referred to as the "Government," and Frederick E. Engstrum, of the city of Washington, D. C., for and in behalf of a corporation to be formed by him to carry out the provisions of this contract and to be governed by a board of seven directors, one to be selected by the Secretary of War, one by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the remaining five by proponent, party of the second part, and hereinafter referred to as the "lessee."

2. LEASE.

The lessee hereby leases all the property, real, personal, or mixed, now owned or hereinafter acquired by the Government in connection with or forming part of, or the possession, use, construction, maintenance, operation, or extension of the Muscle Shoals project, or any part or appurtenance thereof, including the steam plant located at Gorgas, Ala., on the Warrior River, together with transmission lines. Said property is included or intended to be included in the maps, deeds, descriptions, invoices, lists, and schedules furnished to the lessee by the Government and receipted for, and such maps, deeds, descriptions, invoices, lists, and schedules, together with receipts for same, hereinafter referred to as the "schedule," shall be a part of this agreement and shall bind both parties as truly as if they were written herein.

3. TERM.

This lease is to continue in full force for a period of 50 years from date the lessee acquires possession of the property. The lessee shall return said property at the termination of this lease to the Government in good operating condition, subject to damage beyond fault or control of lessee.

4. PLANS AND SPECIFICATIONS.

It is mutually agreed by both the Government and the lessee that for and in consideration of the lease, construction, operation, rights, privileges, payments, and other considerations hereinafter mentioned or otherwise provided for in this agreement that the lessee will construct Dam No. 2, power station, and such other structures now under construction or agreed to be constructed at Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee River in the State of Alabama, and hereinafter referred to as the "property," as are set forth and described more particularly in the maps, plans, specifications, photographs, and other engineering data (hereinafter referred to as the "plans"), copies of which have been delivered to lessee and duly receipted for by lessee, and such plans thus receipted for are hereby made an essential part of this contract and are as binding on both parties as if they were fully set forth and written herein. When the Government shall require the construction of Dam No. 3, for which there is no complete engineering plans, the lessee agrees and is to build the same on plans and specifications to be prepared by the Government and on a location to be approved by the Government, and the lessee shall lease the same under the terms of this contract.

5. LOCKS OR LIFTS.

It is further agreed that the lessee will construct for the Government the locks or lifts for the purpose of maintaining navigation over the dam or dams to be constructed at Muscle Shoals.

6. MANUFACTURE OF NITRATES.

The lessee agrees to operate the nitrate plants, now a part of the property (which have an estimated capacity of 120,000 tons per annum), together with other plants that may hereinafter be built, to manufacture such fertilizer compounds or mixtures and complete fertilizers as approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and to commence operation of one plant within one year after it acquires possession, and as soon as sufficient power is generated by the hydroelectric plants belonging to the property, it will operate at full capacity all the plants that can be operated from the receipts of the sale of the fertilizer compounds, together with the receipts from one mill per kilowatt hour, from sale of all power generated in excess of that required to operate the plants.

7. ALTERATIONS OF NITRATE PLANTS.

It is also agreed that the lessee will make such alterations, additions or changes in the nitrate plants as may be required to produce the nitrates or other fertilizer compounds approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and to be completed within the time required to produce hydroelectric power at Dam No. 2. After the plants have been put in operation under this lease the lessee shall make such additions or changes, from time to time, as may be necessary to produce the required fertilizer or fertilizer compounds approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and such changes, and the cost of producing complete fertilizers, are to be made as an operating charge from the funds on hand derived from the sale of fertilizer compounds and the power not required to operate the plants.

8. PLANS OF ALTERATIONS.

It is agreed that the lessee will furnish the Secretary of War copies of the plans and specifications of the proposed changes to be made in the nitrate plants to fit them to produce the fertilizer compounds approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. Such alterations are to be so designated as to keep the nitrate plant No. 2 in condition to produce explosive compounds with the least delay and expense.

9. RESEARCH.

The lessee agrees to maintain and operate a research department in cooperation with the Agriculture Department of the Government for the purpose of developing the processes for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, the cost of research work to be charged to operating expenses of the plant.

10. CONSTRUCTION.

Lessee agrees to begin construction within 60 days from the time it is given possession of the property and to continue such construction in a diligent, business, and workmanlike manner until all construction work provided for under this contract shall be completed, according to terms hereinafter set forth, within three years from the time of possession, reasonable extension of time to be granted for delays over which the lessee has no control.

11. CHANGES.

It is further agreed that at any time during the construction, if, in the opinion of either party herein, the structures provided for in the plans have become, or are liable to become, weak, dangerous, uncertain, or inefficient they may request changes, extensions, or additions to be made in the plans for the purpose of increasing the strength, stability, duty, endurance, or efficiency of the dams, locks, power stations, or other structures to be built by lessee under provisions of this contract, such changes, extensions, or additions shall be submitted to the engineer representing the other party and to the surety company furnishing the bond of the lessee, and if such changes, extensions, or additions shall be approved by the engineer representing the other party and the surety company they are to become a part of this contract and become as binding on both parties, and the bonds of the lessee, as if originally written herein.

12. ARBITRATION.

It is also provided that, in event a request of either party for changes, extensions, or additions in the plans for any of the purposes set forth in the foregoing paragraph of this contract has been approved by the surety on the bond of the lessee, and has not been approved by the engineer representing the other party, then the question of endurance or strength of such material or members as can be determined by physical test shall be submitted to the United States Bureau of Standards for final determination, and all questions as to the effect of the proposed changes, extensions, or additions upon the increase of strength, stability, duty, endurance, or efficiency of the dams, locks, power stations, or other structures to be built under this agreement, the plans for the changes as requested shall be submitted to the engineering faculty or such members thereof who will undertake the work of one or both of the following named universities or schools of technology: Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Mass.; Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., and the report of such faculty or faculties, if submitted to more than one, together with the report of the Bureau of Standards, shall be final, and if such report of the Bureau of Standards and faculties of technical schools, mentioned herein, show that the proposed changes, extensions, or additions will materially increase the strength, stability, duty, endurance, or efficiency of the structure affected by the changes, extensions, or additions, then such changes, extensions, or additions shall become a part of the working plans of this contract the same as if they were originally written herein, or had been approved by the engineers of both parties and the surety bond.

13. COSTS OF TESTS.

It is also understood and agreed that the cost of testing, consulting, or other expenses caused by the request for changes in the plans, as provided for, shall be a part of the construction cost provided herein.

14. REPRESENTATIVES.

It is understood and agreed that during the time of construction that both parties hereto shall designate an engineer to represent them on the work and the acts of such engineer shall be binding as to the party designating him as a representative.

15. INVESTMENT.

It is further agreed that the lessee will not be required to invest in the manufacture of nitrates or other fertilizer compounds any money other than that received from the sale of the products of the nitrate plants plus 1 mill per kilowatt hour received from the sale of power in excess of that required to operate the plant.

16. SALE OF PRODUCTS.

It is further agreed that the lessee will sell all fertilizer and fertilizer compounds produced by the plant at prices and on conditions and terms approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

17. ADDITIONAL PLANTS.

It is further agreed that in event the development of power for use and sale from this plant, together with the receipts from the sale of products, should be insufficient to produce the amount of fertilizer compounds required to supply the demands, the lessee agrees to construct, under the terms of this agreement, other power plants or storage reservoirs upon sites owned by the Government and selected by the Secretary of War and itself, said plants or storage reservoirs to be constructed and operated under the general terms of this agreement for the purpose of enabling it to provide the fertilizer compounds to meet growing needs.

18. PROFITS FROM NITRATES.

It is also further agreed that when nitrates can be made at a profit or when the cost of the same has been so reduced that the funds arising from the sale of excess power and fertilizer compounds are not needed in whole or in part for financing such productions as herein provided, the said funds shall be paid by the lessee into the Treasury of the United States.

19. CONSIDERATION.

In consideration of the performance of the foregoing proposals and conditions the Government shall agree to pay to the lessee the cost, plus 5 per cent, of the completion of Dam No. 2, the initial alterations of nitrate plants No. 1 and No. 2, and the completion of the locks at Dam No. 2, and when required by the Government to build Dam No. 3 and the locks at Dam No. 3 and additional plants and storage reservoirs on the same terms, in monthly payments, as per estimates of the engineers upon schedule of work performed.

20. PAYMENTS.

It is agreed herein that the engineer representing the Government will on the first of each month give the lessee an estimate of the work performed and a statement of the amount earned by it during the preceding month.

21. STORES, STOCK, AND EQUIPMENT.

All stores, supplies, equipment, including engineers' supplies, files and instruments, and other loose personal property now on or about the premises, whether or not required for construction purposes, but not including subsistence stores, shall become the property of the lessee upon the execution of this contract.

22. COMPENSATION.

It is further agreed that as a part of the compensation for the performance of this contract the lessee will retain the proceeds from the sale of power not required to operate the plant or plants and locks or lifts, over and above the 1 mill per kilowatt hour required for financing the production of fertilizer compounds, or to be paid into the United States Treasury as set forth in this agreement.

23. POWER FOR LOCKS.

The lessee agrees to furnish to the Government free of charge all power required to operate the locks or lifts which are to be operated by the Government.

24. EMERGENCY PROVISION.

The lessee agrees to place the property, or any part thereof, at the disposal of the Government in the event of war or any other public emergency, or to operate the same for the Government to manufacture nitrates, explosives, or munitions of war, or for other purposes necessary for the safety of the United States as the Government may require.

25. BOND.

The lessee agrees to protect the Government for the full and faithful performance of the contract by giving a good and sufficient surety bond, to be approved by the Government.

26. INSPECTION.

It is agreed that the Government experts, inspectors, and accountants can, at all reasonable times, examine the books, papers, accounts, meters, and such other accessories of the plant necessary to satisfy them whether or not the lessee is executing this contract in good faith.

27. REPAIRS.

It is also agreed that should the foundation of Dam No. 2 be found defective or show excessive leakage, the Government will pay to the lessee the expense of the necessary repairs, including a reasonable allowance for overhead.

In witness whereof the United States of America has caused these presents to be executed by the Secretary of War, pursuant to the authority conferred upon him by act of Congress approved the — day of ———, 1922, entitled "An act to provide for the lease and completion of Muscle Shoals, and for other purposes," and the said Frederick E. Engstrum has set his hand on the day and year first herein above set forth.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
By ———,
Secretary of War.
FREDERICK E. ENGSTRUM.

STABILIZATION OF PRICES OF CERTAIN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a report, which I think will be of general interest, made by the National Farmers' Union, with regard to agricultural matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, is as follows:

(By C. S. Barrett, president National Farmers' Union.)

Some persons oppose stabilization of major farm products through the exercise of the collective power of the people because, to them, it looks like paternalism. Others object because, in their judgment, the free operation of the law of supply and demand will be interfered with. Some cooperators see in the plan a danger to the development of commodity organizations.

None of these objections, in my judgment, possesses any merit. We should not be afraid of terms. The truth is that the Government is the great parent, the great protector of the people, although it can not be denied that the people who are least governed are best governed.

Ordinarily and under normal conditions—though what is normal nobody has succeeded in determining, at least to the satisfaction of the masses—cooperation by the Government in private affairs may not be wise. But we are not now living in normal times.

There are some things which private enterprise can not achieve. There are some things which private enterprise ought not attempt to accomplish. For instance, private exertion can not make or execute war. It can not achieve peace. It can not readjust the affairs of a war-riven world.

When this Government decided to enter the war against the Central Powers one of the first steps taken was to assure an adequate supply of food, not alone for the soldiers of the Republic but to enable the armies of France, Italy, Great Britain, and others associated in the terrible enterprise to remain in the field. Nobody at that time suggested that the Government should keep its hands off the farms or should refrain from making such arrangements with agriculture as would guarantee an abundant crop.

That was paternalism. But as far as agriculture was concerned, it was disciplinary rather than beneficent paternalism. The farmer was told that the price fixed was a minimum, and this at the time was generally believed. In practice, however, it proved to be a maximum. The kind of paternalism practiced by the Government of Australia was entirely different. That Government said:

"We will see that you are not required to sell your grain below a certain figure, but if the market should develop such a demand as will justify a higher price, you may take advantage of such a condition."

The consequence is to-day that while the American farmer is groaning under a crushing load of debt, which is increasing at the rate of a million dollars a day, the Australian is enjoying gratifying prosperity. This is said on the authority of one of the most distinguished of Australia's statesmen who visted this country during the deliberations of the International Conference on Limitation of Armaments.

The stabilization plan of the national committee which we recently created provides for exactly what was done and what is now done in a manner adapted to peace needs in Australia. Under it the American wheat producer, cotton producer, corn producer, and wool producer would not be required to dispose of his commodities at a price below a certain minimum, but if market conditions should justify a higher level he would participate in the greater price advantages given.

The methods which our Government would adopt would, of course, be adapted to meet conditions in this country. A. W. Ferrin, late American trade commissioner to Australia, in a communication to the Department of Commerce in relation to the Australian stabilization plan, says that a plan of stabilization to meet peace conditions has been agreed upon.

"The Commonwealth Government will advance to farmers on delivery of wheat at sidings 3 shillings a bushel in cash, with a negotiable certificate for further payment when the wheat is sold, freight and handling charge up to 8 pence—or 16 cents a bushel—to be first charge against the wheat."

Mr. Ferrin points out that the advance is arranged through the Commonwealth bank, a financial organization created especially for use by farmers. The cost of producing wheat in Australia is much less than in the United States, so that the minimum advance by the Government need not be as much as in this country.

Through the enlightened policy of the Australian Commonwealth during the war the cooperative spirit was stimulated, and now an overwhelming majority of the wheat farmers and wool producers are members of a common pool. Before the war the Australian farmer had no confidence in organization. He refused to cooperate with anybody, and the consequence was he was the prey of the special interests and food for the speculative manipulating middleman.

My information is that the stabilization plan worked so well during the war that the Government decided that it shall continue in operation. I am assured on the word of an Australian statesman who was one of the pioneers in working out a plan for the stabilization of the farming industry that in any protection the Government has afforded the pool it has never been involved in the loss of a single cent.

I said there were some things which private enterprise can not accomplish. One of these is the salvation of agriculture from the extreme consequences of the recent deflative methods of those in charge of the agencies of government which directly affect the farmers. During the war agriculture suffered from disciplinary paternalism. After the war the Government carried disciplinary paternalism to a cruel extreme, involving hundreds of thousands in ruin and bringing despair and sorrow to hundreds of thousands more.

Now, is it not time that we follow the example of Australia by adopting something of a beneficent paternal attitude toward the only completely essential public utility which exists? It was by the exercise of disciplinary paternalism that agriculture was brought to its present sad plight; now we must do our best to erase the marks of cruel discipline by the exercise of that repairing kindness which necessarily makes up a part of the character of a true parent.

Those who object to the exercise of the power of government to save an industry which the census bureau says is worth $80,000,000,000 could do well to examine the Pittman bill. This measure was adopted to prevent the loss of the silver of America and its purchase by Europe and Asia to be used in minor money coinage.

The Government, seeing that it would lose a vast amount of the metal necessary in coinage, decided to pay a minimum price of $1 for every ounce of pure silver produced in the United States. It did not matter what the markets of the world offered for the same metal. It was necessary to stabilize the American product.

There is no evidence of opposition to this bill in the Senate or in the other branch of Congress. No statesman believes it has done the slightest injury. Nobody asks for its repeal. On the contrary, there is a very lively sentiment for an extension of the bill after it expires in two years from now. The author of the measure says that the great silver mines of Nevada and other States are working at a profit, and the practical effect of the measure has been to stabilize and steady the white-metal markets of the world.

During the debate on the bill before it was enacted it was insisted that money being absolutely essential to commerce and industry, we must save to America one of the two precious metals that was in danger of being shipped in too great abundance to Europe and Asia. To do this it was necessary to pay the men who produced silver a sum which at least approximated the cost of production. This was regarded as sound, reasonable, and logical, and the judgment of the champion of the measure was written into law.

Nobody called such legislation paternalistic or socialistic. On the contrary, they accepted the principle that in an emergency the Government should use its power to save to the Nation a metal deemed essential for coinage purposes and necessary to commerce and industry. Now the question arises if it is necessary to save a coinage metal, how much more necessary is it to save an industry upon which we are wholly dependent for our existence? We may at some inconvenience to ourselves be able to dispense with silver coin. We may close the silver mines of the country and still be able to worry along and collect sufficient food on which to live. But what would happen to this Nation and to the world were we to close the farms?

I am not attempting to go into the merits of the silver stabilization bill, for it is that and nothing more. I am only showing that if a great national crisis had suggested to our Congress the need for enacting legislation which would assure a continual and necessary supply of silver money, how much greater must be the impression on the official mind when the necessity for saving agriculture is presented?

I am convinced that if the farmers next fall are unable to collect cost of production, or something approximating it, the financial and mental condition of agriculture will be such as to constitute a real peril to the Nation. Scores of thousands of men who earn their living on the farms are preparing to leave, and they will leave at a great sacrifice to themselves and their families. The mental attitude of such men toward this Nation and this Government will be such as ought to cause statesmen real concern.

There is, of course, the possibility that markets may be so adjusted or more probably manipulated as to enable the farmers after the next crop is harvested to collect cost of production. But we should forge the weapon and create the instrumentalities which will assure this. Without them farmers are assuming a risk which will have a depressing, almost paralyzing, effect on productive effort. Assured of some reward, assured that they may be able to cease borrowing and even pay something on old and long-standing accounts, the mental attitude of Uncle Reuben will necessarily undergo a complete change.

I am not proposing a cure-all. This plan will not prove to be a remedy for all agricultural ills. It merely steadies the agricultural ship and sustains it while going through the rapids of deflation, falling markets, and other evils. It makes possible orderly marketing and paves the way for complete commodity organization, when I hope all we will require of the Government will be sympathetic cooperation in our purpose to find a more direct way to the consumer.

There is now before Congress a bill which commits the Government to the stabilization of the shipbuilding and ship-operating enterprise. Such a bill would cost the country hundreds of millions of dollars. Those who characterize the demand of the farmers for price stabilization legislation as socialistic applaud this bill, declaring it to be enlightened, progressive, and constructive legislation.

The bill which we ask for, unless all precedent is set aside, would not cost the Government a cent. It would lay no tax burdens on the people, but, on the contrary, it would fill empty box cars by the thousands, would open idle factories, and set millions of unemployed to work. But it is characterized by some statesmen as an idle dream, by others it is associated with the most repugnant form of socialism, while still others see in it a return or reversion to what they regard as the worst type of paternalism in government.

The ship subsidy bill constitutes business in government, but the agricultural stabilization measure is government in business. It is peculiar how the diversified mentality of American statesmenship works.

Some persons believe if the factories of the United States were opened the farmers would once more prosper. I agree with this, but the only way to open the factories is to restore the buying power of the farmers. If prosperity returns, it must be initiated on the farm.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 213, proposing to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senate for taking up its time about a matter that was not strictly within the unanimous-consent agreement. What I rose for this morning was to discuss briefly the pending resolution in reference to a change of the rules so as to put all the appropriation bills of the Senate in the hands of one committee.

A number of years ago in the House of Representatives, when every effort was being made to economize, cut out unnecessary expenditures, and prevent the duplication of appropriations and of work, I made an effort to concentrate the power of appropriation under one general head that was proposed to be called a budget committee. The effort did not succeed at that time; but it was apparent to me then, and it has been apparent to me since, that the system that existed in the past has been one cause of wasteful expenditures. I do not mean to say that a vast amount of the expenditures of the Government of the United States are wasteful—not by any means—but I do mean to say that there are a great many expenditures that we make every year that can be classed as wasteful, not only because the Government and the people of the United States do not receive value for the appropriation but because it often causes the same work to be done twice over; it causes double expenditures. More than that, my experience on the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives a number of years ago, and for six years on the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, has led me to believe that by reason of the fact that in the old days the appropriations were scattered through a number of committees, in the House and in the Senate, departments of the Government that had some special object that they wanted to accomplish and desired the money to do it with were enabled to run from one committee to another, and if they could not get the appropriation from the general committees they would try to bring in the item on an appropriation bill. After it had been disposed of and rejected in the ordinary course, they would come back from every angle possible and try to work out their special schemes.

Up to the eighties the appropriations of the Government were confined to a single committee in the House and a single committee in the Senate. I am told that it grew largely out of an effort to take away from the power of Mr. Randall, of Pennsylvania, who was then chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and who was not in entire accord with some of his party leaders in the House of Representatives, but in the eighties a number of the appropriation bills were divided and given to other committees. Of course, the Senate had to respond when a division came, and later on there were other divisions, and again the Senate responded, for as long as the appropriation bills originate in the House of Representatives, the manner of disposing of those bills must be primarily determinated by the House, because when a bill is made up it can not be divided up. A bill is an entity in itself, a creation in itself.

The actual paper has to pass. I know that we are so much in the habit of dealing with numbers of printed documents and printed bills that we do not visualize the engrossed and the enrolled bill as it goes through. But it is one bill. The Senate can not act on it until the House sends that actual bill to the Senate. It comes here and is referred, and when it is in the committee the Senate can not act because it does not have possession of it.

Therefore, when the House makes up certain items in one bill, in one document, the Senate is bound by that proposition, unless it should make up its mind to defeat the bill and start a new practice of originating appropriation bills in the Senate instead of allowing the House to do so. Of course, if that occurred, it would bring on endless conflicts between the two Houses of Congress.

The House of Representatives has changed its method of doing business. It has concentrated the appropriation bills in one committee, and it has entirely changed the forms of those bills. It has taken many items which did not go together formerly and classified them in a new formation, into one bill, which, of course, entirely changes the conditions under which we were in the habit of acting upon them in the Senate. In other words, if we are to recognize those bills as they come from the House—and we must—then we find the jurisdiction of the committees which had control of these matters before entirely gone, as to a bill over which one or two or three committees of the Senate formerly had control. As I have said, we can not change that. Of course, a portion of a bill could not be referred to one committee and another portion to another committee, because the bill is an entity itself which has to go to the committee.

I recognize, of course, that a bill might be referred to one committee, and that committee allowed to act upon it, and then it could be referred to another committee, and that committee allowed to act upon it, and then to a third committee, to allow it to act upon it; but when you got through that process you would only have delayed legislation, you would have put a block in the way of a good deal of good and effective and useful legislation, and really would accomplish no great object by it. So it seems to me that the only thing which can be done, now that the House has changed its rules, if the Senate is not going into legislative war with the House, is for us to make our rules conform to the rules of the House and provide for these bills all being considered in one committee.

More than that, Mr. President, we have good warrant for that proposition; and the reason why I am speaking on this matter, and the only reason, is that I am a member of the Committee on Rules. This proposal came before our committee for consideration. It became necessary for me to act on it one way or the other—to accept it or reject it. I believed it was in the public interest and that it should be accepted, and that the consolidation of the appropriation bills in one committee should take place. I had good authority for that. During a large part of the last Congress and in the term of Mr. Wilson, the last Democratic President, he urged upon the Congress the passage of a budget bill and the taking of this action. One of the measures he urged in the interest of economy in the expenditure of public money was the passage of a budget bill and the consolidation of appropriations in the hands of one committee. Is there any less reason for economy to-day than there was when Woodrow Wilson was President of the United States?

In addition to the urgent request of the Democratic administration to have this consolidation in the interest of economy, the last Democratic convention, speaking with the authority of my party, declared in favor of the consolidation of all appropriation bills in one committee.

It seems to me that under those circumstances there was but one thing for the Democratic members of the Rules Committee to do when this proposal came before them for consideration. Knowing that it was in the interest of economy, knowing that it had the approval of their party in the past, and knowing that it had the sanction of the highest authority in their party, the proper course to pursue was to be in accord with the proposal and support the resolution.

I want to say, however, that, although I agreed to the proposition and felt that it was our duty to act along these lines, I was in favor of making the proposition as liberal as possible. I realized fully that the legislative committees of the Senate which had had jurisdiction of the appropriation bills for many years past naturally would not want to give up their jurisdiction. More than that, I realized that there were men on those legislative committees who had handled the appropriation bills in the past, knew their details, had the information in reference to them, and could be of vast service to the Government, because the real thing which makes service here is knowledge and information, not brains or brilliancy.

Therefore I was glad to join with other Senators on the Rules Committee in liberalizing the proposed rule as it was originally introduced and in providing that a certain number of the members of the legislative committees of the Senate should have a right to sit and act with the Appropriations Committee when appropriations concerning matters over which those several committees had legislative jurisdiction were before the Appropriations Committee. Of course, all the members of those committees could not be taken; but in providing that three of them shall be on the Committee on Appropriations I think the rule exceedingly liberalized a proposition which was commended by my party and, I believe, by the party on the other side of the aisle.

There was only one danger in the bill, it seemed to me. I think it will work great economy to have the power and the responsibility of these great appropriation bills contained in one committee, and have one set of men exercising that power, and being chargeable with that responsibility; but I felt that there was one danger, and that was of legislation creeping into the appropriation bills more than it has done in the past, the jurisdiction of the legislative committees of the Senate being taken away. I made the suggestion in the committee that we go further than the present rule, which prohibits general legislation on appropriation bills, and makes it subject to a point of order. I suggested that we go so far as to prohibit it, and make the entire bill subject to a point of order if any general or new legislation should be reported on the bill. That was agreed to in the committee, and if the amendment is adopted, as I believe it will be, it will be a part of the rule.

I know the temptation, under stress of circumstances, to write legislation in appropriation bills, because it is the direct method of securing the enactment of law. More than that, I am free to confess that during the period of the war I was guilty myself of adopting such methods, because it was the most expeditious way to accomplish results. But under ordinary circumstances it is not the way that legislation should be considered. I think the legislative committees of the Senate should be fully protected in their rights. An amendment of great import put in an appropriation bill would attract general attention, but a vast number of minor items creating new legislation might be inserted in appropriation bills without attracting any attention and at the same time possibly wipe out the viewpoint and the desire and the intent of the legislative committees of the Senate.

So I believe it worth while to put a supreme penalty on the Committee on Appropriations reporting new legislation. It is done in this amendment. Under the old rule if they reported new general legislation a point of order could be made on the floor and that item would go out of the bill, but if this rule is adopted and the general appropriations committee puts new legislation in the bill, they then endanger the passage of the whole bill and no committee will take a chance of that kind.

So I think that the rule is not only in conformity with the best public interests for economy, it is not only in accord with the principles of my party and the declarations of my party, but I contend that under these circumstances it is an exceedingly fair, just, and liberal rule as it has been reported, and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to offer now an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask if there is not an amendment now pending?

Mr. HARRISON. There is an amendment pending in the form of a substitute, but the Senator has a right to perfect it, as I understand.

Mr. NORRIS. If it is in the form of a substitute, my amendment is in order.

Mr. HARRISON. I was under the impression that all amendments had been offered, and that is the reason why I offered a substitute at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to amend the committee amendment as follows: Insert, on line 9——

Mr. FLETCHER. Is the Senator referring to the new print containing the amendments which have been agreed to?

Mr. NORRIS. It is the only print I know of.

Mr. WARREN. I hand the Senator a print of the resolution with the amendments, showing how it has been amended up to this time.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is a new print, I will refer to it. By a short explanation I can make it plain to all Senators. In fact, I have already given notice that I intended to offer this amendment. I am using the new print now, I will say to the Senator from Florida.

On page 2, line 10, after the word "appropriations," I move to amend by striking out the remainder of the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. President, the effect of this amendment, if agreed to, will be to take away that provision of the new rule which provides that three members of the various other committees shall go over to the Appropriations Committee and be a part of the Appropriations Committee when particular bills now going to such other committees are referred to and are before the Committee on Appropriations. In other words, if my amendment is agreed to, then all appropriation bills coming from the House will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations as it is now constituted, and there will be no transferring to that committee of three members from any other committee in any case.

That part of the committee amendment which provides that if any legislation is contained in an appropriation bill a point of order sustained against it will send the entire bill back to the committee is still left, and will still be in the rule if my motion prevails. It has no other effect than to take away from the rule that part which provides for additional members from other committees to be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations in certain cases. To my mind that part of the rule is indefensible.

After all is said and done, though it may not be the only reason for incorporating it, one of the principal reasons, as has been said, was to secure votes for the resolution. There are some in the Senate who are in favor of the motion to amend I am now making who will vote against it, because they fear it will endanger the rule itself if my motion should prevail. I am not at all afraid of that. I am for the rule. I would not want to endanger it. I have no such object in view. I am going to vote for it whether my motion to amend prevails or does not prevail. I agree with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who has so well pointed out this morning that efficiency in legislation requires that appropriations should be handled by one committee and that the responsibility for them should not be divided, divided responsibility bringing in, as we know, all kinds of difficulties.

I fear that those who are opposed to any change in the existing rules are opposed to this amendment for the reason that they believe that the rule, in whatever form it may be agreed to, will give to the Appropriations Committee too much power; that it is a committee which already has a great deal of power and that the rule will give to it more jurisdiction over appropriations. But Senators forget that part of the rule which is new, which is not in the rules now, which provides that if the committee reports any legislation on an appropriation bill it will be within the power of any Senator to send the whole bill back to the committee, or to recommit the bill in effect.

Mr. President, it seems to me that does away with the danger of more power. It leaves every appropriation in such a condition that we can always put our finger upon the responsible party. There is no divided responsibility. Senators on other committees, jealous, and properly so, of that jurisdiction and their power, are opposed to the change unless the proposed transfer is left in the rule. While I have great respect for those who hold that opinion, I believe they are fundamentally wrong. I want to call attention to what ought to be done if they are right.

There is no provision in the resolution for putting any members of the Judiciary Committee on the Appropriations Committee when there is an appropriation bill pending making appropriations for the Department of Justice. There are other instances of that kind. Why should not members of the Committee on the Judiciary be placed on the Appropriations Committee when the Department of Justice is being appropriated for if, for instance, members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are going to be placed on that committee when the Agriculture Department is being appropriated for? Why should not members of the Committee on Indian Affairs be placed on the Appropriations Committee when appropriations are being made for the Indian Bureau, if we place on the Appropriations Committee members of the Commerce Committee or the Committee on Military Affairs when appropriations are being made for the Army?

I do not believe there is any answer to that question. Fundamentally it is wrong. It can not be defended or excused, in my judgment, without going the full length and applying to other committees the same rule that is being applied to the particular committees which are mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. This is certainly carrying the bloc system, which some Senators have been condemning, into the Appropriations Committee, because if we are to have an agricultural bloc on the Appropriations Committee we shall have a District of Columbia bloc on it, too. It is carrying the bloc from every committee in the proposition to put the chairman and two other members of those committees on the Appropriations Committee. That is what it means.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. There has been some condemnation of blocs in the Senate, and yet Senators are trying now to write into the rules of the Senate a provision encouraging the bloc system. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. NORRIS. I said so the other day. I do not know whether the Senator was here.

Mr. CARAWAY. I heard the Senator's statement that the agricultural bloc ought to be recognized.

Mr. NORRIS. There is just as much reason to recognize it.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is the bloc system. It is recognizing in the rules that unless a man is related to some particular industry he is not competent to legislate or appropriate for that industry.

Mr. NORRIS. If the object in putting committees on here would be the same, and that was the only object that I could see in putting the bloc on, it would make too many candidates for presidential favor.

Mr. CARAWAY. I realize the temptation it would be to Members.

Mr. NORRIS. And the President would not have offices enough to go around.

Mr. CARAWAY. We can create some new ones and take care of them.

Mr. NORRIS. That might be possible. If all of the blocs were as successful in getting their heads and leaders placed in like positions as was the agricultural bloc, we would have to devise a whole lot more offices.

Mr. President, as I said, there is no reason why members of the Committee on Military Affairs or the other committees named in the rule should be placed on the Committee on Appropriations any more than there is that other committees not named in the proposed rule should have representatives on the Committee on Appropriations. That must be apparent. That can not be disputed. That is self-evident. Why the discrimination, then? Is there any other reason than that which has been given and was intimated, that when they made this change they realized that the committees which now have appropriation powers would be jealous and would not want to give them up, and they might not get sufficient votes to make the change, so therefore they eased them up, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] said, and put three members on the Committee on Appropriations from each one of those committees, and that later on probably they would be taken off. I think they ought to be taken off now.

It is either right or it is wrong. If it is right—and I believe, especially since we have adopted the Budget system, that it is right—we ought to place the responsibility on the Appropriations Committee and give them the power over all general appropriation bills. If experience demonstrates that the committee is too small we will make it larger. My own judgment is that experience will demonstrate that it is already large enough, because we have taken away, if we adopt this rule, all temptation for them to legislate.

I think I realize that a great many of the Senators are opposed to the proposition which I make in the way of this amendment, and I shall probably lack sufficient votes to get it adopted. I would like to have a vote on it and would like to have a record vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator that he understands that the question on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi would come first.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw that amendment for the present.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It proposes to strike out and then to insert new matter in lieu of that which is stricken out. Therefore the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi would be in order after the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska should have been voted upon, whether it is adopted or not.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. If my amendment proposed to strike out all of the committee amendment I think the suggestion of the Chair would be correct, but my amendment only proposes to strike out a portion of the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Mississippi to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw it.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; then there will be no misunderstanding.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska I desire to say just a few words in opposition to it. I am opposed to the Senator's amendment because it leaves the resolution practically as it was originally introduced, with the exception of the amendment providing for a point of order being raised against the entire bill in case any item of new legislation or additional appropriation is reported. That amendment itself is not bad; I have no objection to it; but I seriously object to the resolution as it was originally introduced. I think that the amendment reported by the Committee on Rules providing for representation on the Committee on Appropriations of three members from various other committees which have heretofore had jurisdiction of certain appropriation bills very much improves the resolution.

I think that the resolution as amended by the committee ought to be agreed to. I had no objection to it as it stood, but the Senate has seen fit to change it in some respects, so that instead of the chairman of each of the other committees and two other members of the committee named by him serving on the Appropriations Committee when the appropriation bills of which those committees have heretofore had jurisdiction are being considered, the amendment to the resolution adopted by the Senate leaves it for the respective committees to select the three members who shall represent them on the Committee on Appropriations. I have no particular objection to that; I do not think that weakens the resolution as originally proposed to be amended by the committee, but I do not agree with the Senator from Nebraska that it would be better to adopt the resolution practically as introduced, sending all the general appropriation bills to one committee without any sort of representation on that committee of the various other committees having legislative jurisdiction of the various subject matters. The amendment by the committee very much improves the resolution, and in view of the situation in the House of Representatives, with the idea of facilitating the work of Congress, I think the proposed rule as embodied in the resolution as amended by the committee might very well be accepted by the Senate. I am inclined to think it would promote both economy and efficiency in the handling of legislation and, perhaps, speed action, if such a thing is possible, in the Senate.

I can not, however, agree with the Senator from Nebraska that by adding three members from each of the large committees having legislative jurisdiction and heretofore handling appropriation bills coming within their jurisdiction there would be thereby created divided authority. That seems to be the only point which the Senator makes; that by adding other members divided responsibility will be created. I can not see that it has that effect at all. There will be added to the Committee on Appropriations three members from the Committee on Military Affairs when the Military appropriation bill is being considered; three members of the Committee on Commerce, to be selected by that committee, will be added to the Committee on Appropriations whenever there is being considered the bill providing appropriations for rivers and harbors, and so on with the various other committees, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and so forth.

Those additional members will not be permanent members of the Committee on Appropriations at all; they will simply serve while the particular bill heretofore handled in their committee is under consideration. I think the plan will work all right and that it would be a great mistake entirely to eliminate all representation of the large committees on the Committee on Appropriations in the circumstances I have mentioned, as would be the case if the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska prevailed. I therefore hope that that amendment will not prevail. In view of all the circumstances, I much prefer and I cordially favor the resolution, with the amendment reported by the committee. The amendment already adopted to that amendment providing for the selection of the three members by the committee instead of their being named by the chairman is unobjectionable, I think, and perhaps may be more satisfactory; but I am quite clear that there would be no divided responsibility such as the Senator from Nebraska seems to apprehend.

There is no argument, it seems to me, against the representation as provided by the committee amendment of the large standing committees which have jurisdiction generally of the various subjects matter when appropriation bills affecting them are under consideration by the Committee on Appropriations. I think the resolution as originally introduced is very much improved by the committee amendment. Therefore I should, I think, feel compelled to vote against the resolution if the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska should prevail.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which now has jurisdiction of one of the largest appropriation bills which come before the Senate, I certainly have no objection to the duties of that committee respecting the appropriation bill being transferred to any other committee if thereby the work may be done better and more in the interest of the public. I certainly am not looking for a continuation of that work.

I am satisfied, however, that in each case undoubtedly three Members who are at the head of the respective committees concerned will be assigned to the Committee on Appropriations when the appropriation bills in which they are interested are being considered. Those three Members, generally speaking, have had years of experience in connection with the consideration of appropriations for the various departments over which their jurisdiction extends; and, at least at the beginning, I think it would be most desirable to have the experience and knowledge of those Members and that it would be valuable to the Committee on Appropriations.

I think the House of Representatives recognized that fact when it enlarged its Committee on Appropriations by taking experienced members from various other committees which had theretofore had charge of separate appropriation bills and making them members of the Committee on Appropriations.

I believe that the proposed change in the rules will add a great deal to the work of the Committee on Appropriations, and that many subcommittees of that committee will have to be created. Certainly, therefore, in my opinion, there should be an enlargement of the general Committee on Appropriations if it is not to be temporarily enlarged by the assignment of members of the respective legislative committees which have heretofore handled appropriation bills.

So, Mr. President, without desiring to keep more work before my committee—for I could readily, if I were to consult my own comfort, transfer much of that work to another committee, retaining only the jurisdiction of the general legislation that may come before it—in the interest of what I believe is the good of the Government during at least the next few years, I believe that the method suggested by the Committee on Rules under the amendment which it has reported is a desirable one for us to follow. For that reason alone I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which was pending when I withdrew it in order that the Senate might consider the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, which has heretofore been read.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a good many of the Senators are now at lunch. In their absence I want to place a statement in the RECORD so that they may read it, perhaps, when they find out what this rule does to them and to their constituents.

The distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] is on the Naval Affairs Committee. Naturally his State is greatly interested in matters affecting the Navy. He will be eliminated from the consideration of appropriations when this rule is adopted.

The senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is a member of the Indian Affairs Committee, the committee that heretofore has made the appropriations for the Indian tribes. Few States are more interested in the welfare of the Indians than is Arizona; and yet under this rule, if it should be adopted, Arizona's representation will be taken away from her, and the subject will be placed in the hands of the distinguished junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and his colleagues on the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There are a few Indians in Maine.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and pretty wild ones.

Louisiana is represented on the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee by the junior Senator from that State [Mr. BROUSSARD]. It is a very important committee, which for years has made the appropriations to carry on the Postal Service of the country; and yet under this rule, if it should be adopted, Louisiana's representation in the matter of appropriations to care for post offices and postmasters and the Postal Service of the country will be taken away from her.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not want to interrupt the Senator in his line of argument, but I desire to make this suggestion to him: A great deal has been said here about making this resolution of such a character that no legislation could be passed hereafter in appropriation bills. I should like to ask the Senator if the most powerful and effective way of passing legislation is not through the control of the purse strings of the Government?

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely. That is my experience.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And is it not a fact that an appropriations committee can so cut down appropriations as to nullify any legislation which the rest of the Congress passes?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is correct.

To-day the great State of New York is represented on the Commerce Committee, the committee that heretofore has considered appropriations for the improvement of the great harbor of New York and its rivers, the committee that will deal with the ship-subsidy proposition concerning which the President appeared before Congress the other day and which he is now advocating. That question and all the questions that affect the merchant marine and shipbuilding are now in the hands of the Commerce Committee, and that committee makes the appropriations; and yet, if this resolution is adopted, New York's representation on the Commerce Committee, so far as the appropriations for her harbors and her rivers are concerned, will be taken away and placed in the hands of the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and his colleagues on the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say to the Senator that New York was represented upon the Committee on Appropriations by the very able junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] when he requested release from that committee in order that he might go on others which he thought more important for his State. On the other hand, it would seem as if the position of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] on the Committee on Appropriations as to part of the appropriation bills would perhaps atone in some measure for the absence of the junior Senator. However, there are 48 States, and the Senator will observe that with 16 Members on the committee it is hardly possible that every State shall be represented.

Mr. HARRISON. If there is one State in this Union that is entitled to representation on the Appropriations Committee, however, it is the great State of New York.

Mr. WARREN. And the junior Senator from that State wished to vacate the place because he wanted more power somewhere else.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] went off the Appropriations Committee in order to go on the Finance Committee. That, however, was before the ambitious gentlemen who now compose the Appropriations Committee sought to enlarge its jurisdiction and usurp the powers of other committees. I have no doubt that if at that time this proposed rule had been presented to the Senate, to take away from the Commerce Committee the power to make appropriations for the great harbor of New York and lodge it in the hands of the Appropriations Committee, the junior Senator from New York would not have sought the Finance Committee and gone off the Appropriations Committee; so the illustration that the Senator from Wyoming gives shows the outrageous character and disastrous consequences of this proposed rule.

Take the State of Arizona, represented in part by the junior Senator from that State [Mr. CAMERON]. When he came here he sought, no doubt, and there were given to him, places on two important committees. One was the Indian Affairs Committee; the other was the Military Affairs Committee. Both committees appropriate money for the welfare and the interests of Arizona as well as the rest of the country. Service on those two committees particularly appealed to the junior Senator from Arizona; and yet he is called upon here to vote for a resolution that takes away from those committees that allured him to become a member of them part of the jurisdiction which they now have, and places it in the hands of this new and powerful Committee on Appropriations. I can not believe that the junior Senator from Arizona will vote for any such proposed rule that will affect his standing in the Senate as this rule will, or that will affect the welfare or the interests of his State as it is sure to do.

Here is the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. He is on two committees which are very powerful under the present rules of the Senate. Both make appropriations. One is the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The Senator's heart is vitally interested in the agricultural welfare of the country. The other is the Committee on Commerce. If this proposed rule is adopted, and those committees lose their authority to make appropriations, what will be left for the Senator from Arkansas to do?

Going down the list, here is the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. He is on the Commerce Committee, and on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. Those are his two committees. Both make appropriations; and yet under this proposed rule that authority is taken away from those two committees and given over to the 16 Senators comprising the Appropriations Committee.

On day before yesterday the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] made a speech. He advocated the passage of this resolution. I wonder if he had ever looked into the fact that if this resolution is adopted and the Appropriations Committee is given this enlarged authority, New Jersey, one of the great States of this Union, will have no representation on any committee of the Senate that makes appropriations for anything. He is to-day on the Committee on Commerce and on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. His State is vitally interested in the upbuilding of the merchant marine; it is interested in the appropriations that go to improve the rivers and the harbors of the country; and yet, if this proposed rule is adopted, neither the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] nor the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] will be on any committee that makes any kind of appropriations; and yet when the line-up comes, and the vote is cast, they will be found voting with the powerful chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to foist this rule upon them.

We come now to the distinguished junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. He is on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and yet that great committee will lose an important part of its jurisdiction if this rule should be adopted.

The distinguished senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] is on the Commerce Committee. He has been here long enough and studied these problems enough to understand them. Maine is interested in shipbuilding and she is interested in rivers and harbors, and yet, if this rule is adopted, the appropriations for all rivers and harbors and shipbuilding will be placed in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations.

Rhode Island is a small State, and yet, if this proposed rule is adopted, Rhode Island, interested in shipbuilding, in rivers and harbors, and in naval affairs, will have no representation on any committee that appropriates money for anything in the Government service.

Here is the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING]. When he came here he sought membership on the Agricultural Committee, yet if he votes for the adoption of this rule he is surrendering his voice and his vote for the agricultural interests of the country, as far as appropriations are concerned, and saying to the Senator from Wyoming, "You cast my vote instead of me."

I am sorry the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] is not in his seat. He is affected more than any other Senator by this proposed rule. There are more Indians in Oklahoma than in any other State of the Union. More appropriations are carried in the Indian appropriation bill for the tribes in Oklahoma than for the tribes of any other State, so the Senator from Oklahoma sought membership on committees where he believed he could be of the best service, committees that he thought would deal with the interests of his people more particularly, and he was placed on the Agricultural Committee, the Indian Affairs Committee, and the Post Office Committee, three committees all of which make appropriations. If this rule is adopted, the junior Senator from Oklahoma will lose his ability to vote in committee for any appropriation in the appropriation bills for post offices and post roads, for the Indian tribes, or for the agricultural interests of the country.

The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and he loses on both committees.

The senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is on the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Military Affairs. He loses, by virtue of this rule, on both committees.

The senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] loses by virtue of being on the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] loses by being on the Foreign Relations Committee.

The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the Committee on Indian Affairs. Both committees lose their authority to recommend appropriations, and if this rule should be adopted, the Appropriations Committee would recommend those appropriations.

Few men in this body have higher committee assignments than has the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES]. He is on the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Yet he is asked to vote for a rule which will take away from him the power to vote for the appropriations for the Navy and for the agricultural interests of the country.

If this rule is adopted the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] will lose his power as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and also as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], if this proposed rule is adopted, will lose his influence as a member of the Military Affairs Committee and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], one of the most influential Senators in this body, because of his membership on important committees, is a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, a member of the Committee on Commerce, and a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. He sought membership on those committees because he believed his talents qualified him to serve on them, and he knew that the people of his State were interested in the upbuilding of the merchant marine in the great agricultural interests of the country, and in the Indian tribes who live in the haunts and the hollows and on the hills of Oregon. Yet if this rule is adopted, he will lose his influential position as a member of these three appropriation committees, and will bow to the mighty power of his colleague from Washington [Mr. JONES], and the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

I can not understand how one can imagine that a man will vote away his position and influence and authority and give it over to some other men simply because they want greater power and enlarged influence.

The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] is one of the most powerful members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and a very influential member of the Foreign Relations Committee. He will lose, by virtue of being on those two committees, if this proposed rule shall be adopted.

The junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] is up for reelection. Of course, if you ask his opponents whether he has a hard fight on his hands, they will say "yes," but if you ask the friends of the junior Senator from Indiana if he has a hard fight, they will say "no." Yet he has a fight. He is asked at this time to vote for a rule which will take away his influence over two big appropriation bills, and allow other Senators on other committees to handle those appropriations. He is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, now making the appropriations for the Diplomatic Service of the country, and the Military Affairs Committee, to which he has given great study. Is it fair to his constituents to force him to do it?

Next I come to the distinguished junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], who has recently been honored, and justly so, by being made chairman of the agricultural group. He has by his votes, by his expressions, and by his editorials, wielded an influence for the agricultural welfare of the country. If this proposed rule is adopted, he will lose his influence, as well as his votes, to provide appropriations for agriculture, as well as for military affairs, being a member of the two committees which now recommend those appropriations. He will surrender that influence, and give it over to the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and his colleagues on the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. President, I shall not go through this list. I have read enough to show how it would affect different Senators, but I want to talk a little about the membership of the Committee on Appropriations as it is now constituted. It is unfair to them to give this additional power to the Committee on Appropriations. They are worked almost to death now. You can not get a word with one of them. They hold meetings morning, afternoon, and night; yet we are trying to give them more power and to impose on them additional burdens.

Let us take the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], for instance. As chairman of this committee practically all of his time is taken up in the consideration of the questions which come before that committee; yet he is a member of other committees. He is a member of the Committee on Education and Labor. That committee is entitled to part of his time. He is a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and certainly at this period of readjustment in military matters and of fixing the military program that committee is entitled to his attendance at times. He is a member also of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and he certainly ought to be in attendance on that committee some time. Yet, though he is a member of all these various committees, they want to give him additional power and more burdens. It is impossible for one man to attend to so many duties.

Another member of the Committee on Appropriations is the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. If a Senator were on that committee, and that committee alone, he could handle the situation, perhaps, by working 24 hours a day; but when these Senators are on other committees which take a good deal of their time it is impossible to perform and perform well the duties which are now conferred upon them. The Senator from Utah is a member of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, a committee in the work of which he is interested and of which I think he was once chairman. He is a member of the Committee on Pensions, a committee which at times, just before election especially, gets very busy; and as an election is now approaching that committee will need some of his time. He is a member also of the Finance Committee, a committee which has been working for three years on one proposition but has not been able to get together, though they are slowly approaching the end. That committee calls for a great deal of the time of the Senator from Utah. It is impossible for these hard-worked men to take on additional burdens. In the interest of humanity this should not be done.

There are other Senators who are in similar positions. The senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is one of the hardest-working Senators in this body. He is in attendance on the floor of the Senate whenever he is not in attendance upon one of the committees, but he is in attendance on the Committee on Appropriations so much that he is not very often on the floor of the Senate. He is here now, because this rule is being considered; but the Senator from Washington is on other Committees. He is chairman of the powerful Commerce Committee.

It will take weeks and months for them to consider this new proposal to give a subsidy to the Shipping Trust. They have to work that out, and it will take time. The rivers and harbors bill must also be considered. They can not make the appropriation, but they can pass on some kind of a bill. He is on other committees. He is on the Committee on the District of Columbia. What committee is of more importance, especially to the people of Washington, than the great Committee on the District of Columbia? It takes a lot of his time. Many bills he has championed now bear his name. He is on the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. I understand that committee has before it the McNary bill, an important measure for the great western sections of this country. That takes part of his time. I say that it is humanly impossible for these members of the Committee on Appropriations to take on additional work, when they have now more than they can possibly do.

The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is chairman of the Committee on Rules, and that takes a great deal of his time. It would naturally take the time of any Senator to try to keep the Senate straight. He is on the Finance Committee also, and they have been working hard trying to get the tariff bill out. The Senator from Kansas, who is usually on the floor of the Senate, has not been here for days and weeks. They are trying to evolve this bill, which has been in the minds of a few Senators for three years. I hope he will not be taken away from it. If he is, and given these increased burdens, we will never get a tariff bill out. Let us not give the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] more excuse for longer delay in passing the tariff bill. Yet if this proposed change in the rules is made, they will use it as an excuse for not having time to consider the tariff question; they will claim that they had to go on to the Appropriations Committee and make these appropriations.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I did not quite understand what the Senator said.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator would have agreed with me thoroughly if he had. There would not have been any difference about it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. In order to be absolutely sure about it, will the Senator repeat what he said.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I am afraid it would not please the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If it would not please me, I would not agree with it.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want the Senator to feel badly, because he has enough troubles now.

Now I come to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. Of course, the Senator from Maine is worthy and well qualified, a very powerful member of the Committee on Appropriations. He is also on the Naval Affairs Committee, and he has other duties to perform on other committees.

Then he is upon the Committee on Rules. Now, it is not fair to Senator HALE, and it is not fair to his friends in Maine or to the great State of Maine that has sent so many distinguished and illustrious men to the Senate and the House, to place so much on the shoulders of Senator HALE that he could not bear it, and that he would have to surrender some of his hard work. He has enough duties to perform. He is upon the Committee on Rules, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Committee on Appropriations, and yet you want to give to him the right to recommend all the appropriations for agriculture, for military affairs, for the merchant marine, for Indian affairs, for post offices and post roads, for everything. He can not stand that. He is not a strong man as it is. If he were hale and hearty and big in physique he could do it, but he can not stand the strain under the circumstances.

Then here is the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], a member of the Committee on Appropriations. He is on a number of other committees. He must give some of his time to them. He is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. He is upon the Committee on Claims. He has to consider all the claims against the Government of the United States. He is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, a most important committee. He is a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He has the peculiar position, the responsible position, of granting the privilege to those who may apply for seats in this august body. He is the man who looks over contested elections and says whether or not Senators are entitled to their seats. We should not burden him with greater responsibility. He has been under a severe test for months. He can not carry more burdens. He is working now morning, afternoon, and night, and yet you want to place on him additional responsibilities, to appropriate for agriculture, for the merchant marine, for Post Office and Post Roads, and for every other branch and activity of the Federal Government.

Now I come to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. He is on important committees—Education and Labor, Irrigation and Reclamation, Post Offices and Post Roads, and he is also a member of the powerful Committee on Appropriations.

The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] is a member of the powerful Committee on Appropriations, and yet they want to give him more responsibility in this body. I am not surprised at that, but, considering the strain through which he has gone, he can not stand to have new burdens placed upon him. In addition to being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, Senator NEWBERRY is a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and there are a lot of matters of importance before that committee. He is also a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining and a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and yet you want to enlarge his jurisdiction and add greater responsibilities.

The junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY] has not been here long, but he is in the harness and is working well. He is on other committees besides the Committee on Appropriations. He is a member of the Committees on Interoceanic Canals, Manufactures, and Public Buildings and Grounds, and yet you want to give him at this early stage of his senatorial career additional powers to make appropriations for all the other interests of the country.

Mr. President, I do not care how high Senators may be in this body or what influence they wield, this proposed rule is wrong. The public interests will not be safeguarded by placing in the hands of a few men all the responsibility for all the appropriations for all the interests of the country. Seventeen members of the Appropriations Committee, selected without any respect to section or interest, are certainly bequeathed this great additional power. If you want one body to make the appropriations, well and good.

I was for the Budget system. The amendment which I have offered takes care of the situation under the circumstances. When the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] presented this measure to the Committee on Rules he presented it "because," he said, "Senators, I must do it because of the peculiar rules of the House. They have a single Committee on Appropriations and all bills appropriating money will come here from that one committee. Those bills are so interlocked and interlaced that it is impossible to segregate them, and there must be one Senate committee to handle all appropriation bills."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly; although what the Senator holds in his hand has been read fourteen times already.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am going to make it fifteen, in order that it may be appropriately impressed upon the mind of the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to let the Senator put it in my remarks.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I do not want to do that. I do not want to interrupt the harmonious and mellifluous flow of the Senator's modulated speech, but I just want to read this clause:

The appropriation bills should be considered by single committees of the House and Senate.

The Senator, I believe, made a speech in the Democratic national convention, and perhaps presided for a time over that body——

Mr. HARRISON. It did not do much good.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. He presided, I believe, for a time in the absence of my friend, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who was the presiding officer of that convention. Did the Senator indorse that part of the plank in the Democratic platform?

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator querying me?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; I am asking the Senator from Mississippi a question.

Mr. HARRISON. When the Senator has finished I am going to talk about that. It is one of the principal things about which I rose to speak.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Did the Senator indorse it at the Democratic convention?

Mr. HARRISON. I voted for the platform.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator upheld the platform, then. Was there anything said about it in the campaign?

Mr. HARRISON. Not a thing.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator know whether or not this plank in regard to the Budget system and the clause I read from that particular plank was discussed generally throughout the campaign?

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that, of course, the party to which I belong has always believed in a Budget system, and that plank was intended to indorse the Budget system. We passed it long before and President Wilson vetoed it. You know why he vetoed it. It was on a technical objection that was later acquiesced in by the Republican Congress. It was finally passed with the technical objection eliminated from the provision. The provision in the platform to which the Senator calls my attention was not discussed in the committee on resolutions. It was evidently presented, but I did not know it was in there until it was read by some alert Senator the other day.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. This particular platform did not get us many votes?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is quite true, but that is no reason why Democratic Senators should repudiate it.

Mr. CARAWAY. We believe in the people's rule.

Mr. HARRISON. What the Senator called my attention to was a provision about one committee on the House and the Senate and not about the Budget particularly. That is all right. If you want one committee, I am willing to go through and vote for one committee, but when the House of Representatives adopted this proposal the membership of the Appropriations Committee over there was 17. They have increased it and reorganized it.

Mr. WARREN. The membership was twenty-odd before the reorganization.

Mr. HARRISON. When I was in the House I think it was 17. It never was over 21. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] if I am not right in that respect? He responds yes. It never was over 21, and I think when I was a Member there three years ago it was only 17. Anyway, it was reorganized, increased in membership to 35, and was increased with a view of taking care of every interest in the country. It was made permanent and was not a piecemeal arrangement with some ex officio members involved in the proposition.

This matter should have come up in the beginning of the present session of Congress. The plan should have been conceived then for one committee to handle all appropriations. The committee should have been organized with a view to taking care of the agricultural interests, Indian affairs, the merchant marine, and every other interest in the country, giving them all a fair, square deal, and yet we are asked here to turn it all over to a committee that has been named years ago in part and added to by 1 or 2 at a time for years and now is made up of 16 members without respect to any interest or anything else.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALL in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, the Senator is aware, if he will permit the interruption, that the Budget system has been adopted within the last few months, and that this single committee proposition is naturally a direct outgrowth of the Budget system. That the House adopted the single committee plan is in consonance and harmony with the Budget system.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that is right.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. After the Budget system was adopted in the House and appropriation bills were all referred to one committee for the purpose of carrying out the Budget system, they send their bills over here in such form that it makes it much easier and so frees us from accompanying involvements and complexities that all appropriation bills should be referred here to one single committee. As the Senator is aware, the Committee on Rules, of which he and I alike are members, reported favorably on the proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not vote for it. I was one of two members on the committee who did not vote for it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; I think there were two. I understand the Senator did not vote for it, but the majority did vote for it, and the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], now present, was one of those who supported it.

Mr. HARRISON. As the Senator recalls, the proposed resolution was reported to the Committee on Rules and presented to the Senate because of the peculiar situation in which they found themselves in the House because of there being one committee, and the various bills coming to the Senate from that committee might have various subjects in them to be appropriated for. That is true. That was the sole purpose of it, or it never would have been presented. I do not think there is any dispute about that. The amendment which I have offered in the form of a substitute will take care of that situation in the Senate and will not affect the present arrangement.

There is no politics in this. There will be more Senators affected on the majority side than on this side of the Chamber; but it is not fair to those new Senators who have come here within the last year and now occupy places on important committees, way down on the list, to have all of their responsibilities taken away from them to vote for appropriations, and to give those responsibilities over to a committee made up of only 16 Senators selected without regard to section and without regard to interest.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator will be interested to know of the practical result of the rule which they have in the House. The Post Office Department appropriation bill is now before the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. It was the unanimous opinion of the Republican members of that committee that it was the poorest drafted Post Office Department appropriation bill they had ever had under consideration, and that it was evidently drafted by men who knew nothing about the Post Office Department. That was the comment in that committee about the bill which came from the House under the new rules of the House.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and I suppose other bills will be found in the same condition, drafted by men who had not studied the questions and knew nothing about the subject matter.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And drafted in the House.

Mr. HARRISON. No Senator could speak with greater authority than the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. He had experience with both propositions. He was in the House and he saw how it worked there with several committees making the appropriations. He knows that it did not breed extravagance and it did not cause delay in the passage of the appropriation bills, but it worked well and everybody was satisfied. He saw in this body one committee handling all the appropriations and he had the courage and the wisdom to assist in destroying that system, and he voted to segregate and send appropriation matters into the hands of various committees.

I read to the Senate on Saturday last from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on that subject. The situation is right in line to-day with that which existed then. The same conditions confronted us then that confront us now. We will have a jam here that will prevent us from passing appropriation bills if you give them all to one committee made up of 16 members. You will find yourselves in the end in the worst confusion that has ever confronted this body.

The amendment I have offered I care nothing about except that I want to see the present situation taken care of with the least feeling about it and with as little disarrangement as possible. The substitute that I have offered will accomplish that purpose. The rule proposes that all appropriation bills shall go to the Appropriations Committee, and it will give to that committee greater powers than they have had in the past. They have had no power heretofore in the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate for agriculture, for Indian affairs, for post offices and post roads, for naval affairs, or military affairs; but the substitute which I have offered gives to the Committee on Appropriations, through its chairman, the power to name a subcommittee of three who will sit, not with three members from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry when appropriations for agriculture are under consideration, but with the whole Committee on Agriculture and Forestry acting as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations.

They will consider it as they have previously done; they will pass on it and the Appropriations Committee will make its report. There will be no trouble about it; everything will be held intact, everything will run smoothly. Then at the next Congress, if it is desired to change the system and to have one big Appropriations Committee, let that committee be appointed, and let it do the work. The present personnel of that committee was not made up with a view of giving to it all the power to provide appropriations for all the interests of the country. Therefore, if that committee is to be given this additional power, let us put additional Senators on the committee, thereby enlarging it. So, I say, instead of providing that the whole Appropriations Committee and three members from other committees, acting as ex officio members, shall frame the appropriation, let us reverse the process so that the entire legislative committee which has studied the subject matter now coming within the jurisdiction may consider the appropriation bill together with a subcommittee acting for and representing the Appropriations Committee.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] on Saturday last stated that such a method would destroy the Appropriations Committee, but I contend that it would not affect that committee one particle, except that as to deficiency bills the additional ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations would help in the consideration of those subjects. Why should they not do so? If there is a deficiency in the appropriations for agricultural purposes, why should not the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry consider that deficiency? Why should the Appropriations Committee alone consider it? If there is a deficiency in the appropriations for naval operations, then the substitute provides that the Naval Affairs Committee shall be brought in as a whole in considering that deficiency. Why should it not be so? However, instead of taking power away from the Appropriations Committee it would give them more power, because now as to appropriations for agricultural interests, for the Navy, for the Army, for post offices and post roads, for Indian affairs, the Appropriations Committee have nothing to do.

We now propose to let that committee have something to do with the appropriations for those purposes. They would have three members sitting with the various legislative committees which have to study the respective subject matter questions and make their report. So far, however, as concerns matters coming up in the sundry civil bill, in the legislative bill, and in other bills of which the Appropriations Committee have had exclusive control in the past, my amendment would not affect them in the slightest degree and will take no power away from that committee.

How jealous this powerful committee is lest some little power should be taken from it! And, at the same time, it is always grasping for more power.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I only wish to say, as the Senator referred to me and the argument which I have previously made, that when the appropriation bills were distributed here amongst the committees—and I have served under both systems—I did not believe in concentrating all appropriation bills in one committee. That practice may work well in the other House; it never worked well here; and I thought we got better results and I still think we did from a distribution of bills amongst the committees. Now, however, after full deliberation, Congress has adopted the Budget system. Our whole system of appropriating has been changed by adopting the Budget plan.

The House has changed its system of making appropriations, and I do not really see how we can possibly get along or transact the business of the Government unless we conform to the requirements of the Budget system and to the requirements which the House system has forced upon us. However much I may dislike it theoretically as a general system, we can not repeal the Budget law, and I think the Budget law makes necessary some arrangement of this kind, and the one which is proposed by the Committee on Rules seems a reasonable one.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator that some kind of arrangement has to be made between the other House and the Senate about this matter, since the House has adopted the single appropriating committee plan; but I desire to ask the Senator a question. Instead of the arrangement which is suggested in this proposed change of the rules, allowing all the appropriation bills to go to the Committee on Appropriations to be considered by that committee in conjunction with a subcommittee representing the various legislative committees acting as ex officio members on matters pertaining to the subjects of which the respective committees have jurisdiction, does not the Senator think that we can achieve the same results and that it will cause less friction if we continue to allow the various legislative committees as a whole to act with subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee, the bills being referred to the Appropriations Committee and still being reported back from that committee, the only difference in the two plans being that instead of having three members, say, of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry acting as ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations we would have the whole committee acting as ex officio members, together with a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. LODGE. I am inclined to think, Mr. President, that the new system proposed by the Committee on Rules would work better than the plan which the Senator from Mississippi proposes. I think, under the Budget system, we have got to have the appropriation bills centralized; and, furthermore, the appropriation bills themselves have been so changed that they no longer can be distributed as they have been heretofore. Subjects have been joined together in one bill which heretofore have been in separate bills. For instance, the small appropriation bill pertaining to the Diplomatic and Consular Service, of which my committee has heretofore had charge, as I understand, is mingled with a bill covering the Department of Justice. I will inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if I am correct as to that?

Mr. WARREN. All items pertaining to the State Department and the Department of Justice are included in one bill.

Mr. LODGE. So there are two different subject matters embraced in one bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that.

Mr. LODGE. Of course my committee has no relations with the Department of Justice, and we would have to have, I presume, representation from the Committee on the Judiciary when the bill for the State Department was being considered.

Mr. HARRISON. In the instance cited by the Senator from Massachusetts, if the proposed rule presented by the Committee on Rules should be adopted three members of the Committee on Foreign Relations would be called in to sit with the Committee on Appropriations or with a subcommittee of that committee.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. So that that part of the bill as it came from the House which related purely to the State Department affairs would be segregated, considered, and studied by a subcommittee together with the ex officio members from the other committees.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Could not that be done equally well under the proposal which I submit, inasmuch as the items would have to be segregated in any event? The Committee on Appropriations works through subcommittees, as I understand.

Mr. LODGE. I see the point the Senator has in mind; but it seems to me under the proposal of the Senator from Mississippi the bill embodying items for the State Department and Department of Justice would have to be carried around from one committee to another. It seems to me better to have the bill in the possession of one committee and members of the other committees interested coming to that committee to deal with it. I think that three members will represent the various committees in a perfectly fair way.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the amendment in the nature of a substitute which I have offered the bill referred to would not have to go from one committee to the other. The only difference would be the necessity of providing instead of 3 seats perhaps 17 seats, or whatever the membership of the committee might be.

Mr. LODGE. The bill to which I refer would first have to be considered by the Foreign Relations Committee and then by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRISON. But that would have to be done in any event.

Mr. LODGE. No; not under the system proposed by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HARRISON. The items would have to be segregated.

Mr. LODGE. In the one case the bill would be considered by different committees, while in the other case it would be considered by the same committee with the addition of some other Senators.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, there would not be as many Senators considering the bill under the plan proposed by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me the plan proposed by the Senator from Mississippi would make the system clumsier than it should be.

Mr. HARRISON. The only difference is that there would be more Senators looking after the bill under my substitute than under the committee plan.

Mr. LODGE. I think the system proposed by the Committee on Rules will work better than that suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to see the scheme worked out in this way for a while, and then when a new committee is created it could be enlarged so that all interests would be taken care of.

Mr. President, I have no desire to prolong this discussion or to say more about the pending amendment. I have offered it in the hope that it will be accepted, because I am quite sure that it treats fairly and justly the new membership in the Senate, and that under it the same results will be obtained as will follow under the proposed amendment to the rules reported by the Committee on Rules. Furthermore the plan proposed by me will keep one committee from having too much power and being overburdened with too many duties. We are going to have a congestion here if the proposed rule is adopted and confusion will ensue.

I have two more amendments to offer if the substitute should be defeated. One is to strike out the provision that the bill shall be recommitted to the committee if a point of order is made and sustained against an item as being new or general legislation. The other amendment I will discuss later. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have listened with great admiration to the Senator from Mississippi, who has assumed to speak in defense of a number of Senators whom he has named, but who do not themselves care to be represented, I imagine, in the way he has represented them. I trust that he has their authority, or, if not, that at least he has their consent to make the suggestions in regard to them which he has made; but I doubt whether he has such authority. However, be that as it may, this is the first time in a somewhat long service in the Senate that I have ever heard such heart-rending appeals, such bursts of eloquence, and such feeling displayed over the hardships which may be imposed upon Senators from 48 States by a Senator from one State only, especially when, according to my information, no considerable number, and perhaps none, of them have asked for that kind of defense, if it is defense, which the Senator from Mississippi has undertaken to make. On the other hand, the Senator knows, as we all know, that there are 96 Members of this body from the 48 States, and there are only 16 members of the Appropriations Committee. Now the Senator seems to have switched from his first proposition, in that now he would vote for placing all appropriation bills in the hands of one committee, without representation from the others; but I observe that his vote was not recorded for the amendment to that effect offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who proposed to do that very thing.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. The Senator from Nebraska wanted to give these additional powers to the committee of which the Senator is chairman without adding new members to that committee. I do not want to overwork the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I judge, however, from what the Senator says that he is satisfied with the size of the House committee, which is represented, as he says, by 35 Members out of the four hundred and odd Members of the other House. I think the number is 36, but as 35 or 36 is to four hundred and odd is the ratio in the House of representation upon the Committee on Appropriations. The size of the Appropriations Committee is not demanded by the chairman of that committee, nor by any members of the committee. The size of that committee, and the selection of the men on it, are intrusted to the duly organized Committee on Committees. Those of us who have served on the Committee on Appropriations accept with grace and without comment the Members who are placed upon our committee. Not long ago the membership of our committee was cut from 20 or 21 to 16. So far as I know, no complaint has come from any one of its members.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The main complaint of the Senator from Mississippi seems to be that this rule reposes too much power in the Appropriations Committee. If the rule should be adopted as it was reported from the committee, it would deprive the Appropriations Committee of the power to report legislation——

Mr. WARREN. As it ought to do.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the functions of the Appropriations Committee would be confined to providing for the expenditure of money already authorized by law, so that in practical effect the power of the Appropriations Committee will be diminished in a very important particular. The committee no longer will have the power to report legislation, under the penalty of having its bills sent back to it.

I have heretofore expressed the opinion that under the Budget system, and the method of procedure which has become well established in the House of Representatives, it is almost imperative that the Senate adopt this rule. I reaffirm that position.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is absolutely right.

I observe that the Senator from Mississippi predicts confusion and delay. I will acknowledge to the Senator that it is within his power, under the present rules, to make confusion and delay; and I shall have to acknowledge that he and some colleagues have quite considerably delayed some appropriation bills heretofore. That, however, is all within the game. The Senator had a right to do it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has only delayed to the extent of arguing against any appropriation that he thought was outrageous. As a rule, the Senator from Mississippi has not even discussed the appropriation bills reported by the Senator from Wyoming. He looks over them, generally, and if he thinks everything is all right he does not say a word. I have not discussed any appropriation made in any of the appropriation bills at this session, as I recall, except some items for the Shipping Board which I thought were not just and right.

Mr. WARREN. And the Senator very justly, and with perfect good feeling and grace upon the part of the chairman of the committee, discussed in an able manner and at considerable length those items; and he will acknowledge that other Senators had the same right as to other matters that he had as to the Shipping Board matters. At present we often find here three or four appropriation bills seeking the floor at once, because there is no coordination of these appropriating committees, or perhaps it is impossible for them to coordinate, whereas if the entire subject were placed in the management of one committee that committee would seek the convenience of the committees from which other Senators served ex officio on the Committee on Appropriations, so that they would not all come to the floor at once. That committee will undertake, in the case of those that it has had heretofore, and also the new bills that it has been forcing through here I think almost without precedent as to the number of bills early in the long session, first to ascertain, as to these five or six bills where we have Senators serving ex officio, their convenience, when they can consider them, and how. Of course, we must wait to get them from the House, but subsequently to the receipt of those bills from the House we will follow an arrangement that will avoid the confusion and avoid the congestion that the Senator mentions. The congestion that we have had already will be done away with, with the one exception that I make. Of course, Members now have the privilege, or they have taken the privilege, and I think I have never objected to it, of talking on subjects entirely foreign to the subject before the body, and talking for hours.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the best illustration of the efficiency produced by this rule is given by the appropriations for the Interior Department. Heretofore the Indian bill has taken weeks and weeks to discuss, and the pension bill has taken a week to discuss. At the present session the Interior Department appropriation bill has passed the Senate, and is now in conference. Therefore we have passed the Indian bill, the pension bill, the land bill, and the reclamation appropriation bill all in one bill within three days, whereas in every previous session that I have been here it has taken weeks and weeks to pass them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay a vote on the amendment of the Senate from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], nor do I intend to discuss it now. I do want, however, to call attention to an amendment which I have had printed and which I intend to propose to this rule. I do this because of the agreement we have made that at 4 o'clock we will vote on this rule, all amendments that may be pending, and all amendments that may be proposed, without further debate.

A few days ago I gave notice that I intended to propose an amendment to the rules of the Senate with reference to debate on appropriation bills. At the same time I gave notice that I intended to propose it as an amendment to this bill. On the calendar day of March 2 I gave notice of my intention to propose the following amendment:

When an appropriation bill is under consideration by the Senate debate shall be confined to the bill, unless otherwise ordered by unanimous consent. A point of order that a Senator is not speaking to the bill shall be decided by the Presiding Officer, and an appeal from his decision shall be decided without debate.

I simply call attention to this so that if it is desired to discuss it before 4 o'clock that may be done. I expect to propose it as an amendment to the resolution, and to have it voted on.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the proposal of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is to limit debate in the Senate. Under the Constitution and under the practice both Houses of Congress within the limitations of the Constitution determine their own procedure. I doubt the propriety of attempting to prescribe one method of procedure in this body when an appropriation bill is being considered and leave in force a different rule as to other measures.

The provision of the Senator's amendment has been the subject matter of proposed amendments to the rules ever since my service in the Senate began. For many years there have been Senators who advocated a more effective method than is now found in our rules of confining debate to the subject immediately under discussion. So far as I know, there has never before been submitted to the Senate or to the House of Representatives——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to call for a quorum? This is a very important amendment which has been brought up here.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum. I want the other Senators to hear the Senator discuss this amendment. It is a very important one.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from North Carolina has suggested the absence of a quorum, and, of course, under the rules of the Senate it becomes the duty of the Presiding Officer to order the call of the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	Norris	Stanfield
Ball	Harrison	Oddie	Stanley
Brandegee	Heflin	Overman	Sterling
Broussard	Johnson	Page	Sutherland
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Pepper	Swanson
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Townsend
Capper	Kellogg	Poindexter	Underwood
Caraway	King	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Colt	Lenroot	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Culberson	McCormick	Rawson	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	McKellar	Reed	Warren
Edge	McKinley	Robinson	Watson, Ga.
Fernald	McNary	Sheppard	Weller
Fletcher	New	Shields	Willis
Gerry	Newberry	Shortridge
Gooding	Nicholson	Smith
Hale	Norbeck	Spencer

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], because of a death in his family. I also desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] are in attendance on the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, when the absence of a quorum was suggested I was attempting to discuss an amendment proposed to this rule by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which, in my opinion, has no immediate relationship to the subject matter of the rule proper, and which, if adopted, would probably prevent many Senators who are in favor of the rule as reported from the committee from supporting it.

The proposal of the Senator from Washington in his amendment is a limitation on debate while the Senate has under consideration an appropriation bill. Under the rules of the Senate as they now exist, a Senator is technically required to address his remarks to the subject before the Senate. The precedents, however, hold that when a point of order is raised to the effect that the Senator speaking is not discussing the subject before the Senate, the Chair does not pass upon that question as other points of order are disposed of, but the Chair, according to the precedents, inquires of the Senator having the floor whether he is discussing the subject before the Senate, and if the Senator who is speaking answers that he is, no matter what he is in fact saying, the Chair overrules the point of order. It is a strained form of senatorial courtesy, perhaps, but it does operate to protect the freedom of debate.

The amendment of the Senator from Washington would prescribe one rule for the Senate while the Senate is considering an appropriation bill, and leave in force the existing rule while the Senate may be considering other bills. I think manifestly that whatever rule the Senate may agree to concerning the limitation of debate ought to apply to all subjects before the Senate. There should not be one rule which expressly requires the Presiding Officer to determine whether a Senator is discussing the matter before the Senate when an appropriation bill is under consideration, and another rule leaving it to the Senator who is speaking himself to determine whether he is observing the rule when another matter is under consideration.

Another objection to this amendment is one I have already implied; it is foreign to the subject matter of this resolution. As I stated, when the resolution was first presented to the Senate I was induced to support the amendment to the rules providing for the consideration of all appropriation bills by a single committee of the Senate, namely, the Committee on Appropriations, because after investigating the subject I had reached the conclusion that under the Budget system and the method of procedure which the House of Representatives has adopted it will be very inconvenient, if not impracticable, for the Senate to pursue any other rule than that which is proposed by the Committee on Rules. I had not the slightest idea that into this controversy would be injected a question of limitation on debate.

The House of Representatives has no such rule as this amendment contemplates. When an appropriation bill is in Committee of the Whole in the House of Representatives almost universally there is allowed what is called general debate. Usually by agreement some period is fixed for that general debate, and while the general debate is in progress any Member who can secure the floor may address his remarks to any subject he chooses. He is not required, under the rules of the body at the other end of the Capitol, to confine his remarks to the bill under consideration or to any other special subject.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. While, as I have stated, I offered this amendment several days ago and called attention to it at the time, I offered it entirely on my own responsibility, without conference with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or any other member of the committee. I do not want to press this to a vote if Senators feel that they did not have any notice of it. I know the amendment is quite different from the general terms of the proposed rule, so I can see how Senators may justly feel that they did not have a right to expect that anything of this kind would come up. I would like, some time, to get a vote upon the rule which I proposed, but I feel that under the circumstances it would probably be better for me to state that I will not offer the amendment. I do not want to embarrass any Senator, I do not want to embarrass the rule which is pending, and I do not want any Senator to feel that any advantage has been taken in any way, shape, or form.

So I say to the Senator from Arkansas that I will not propose the amendment in accordance with my notice. I do wish to express the hope that in the near future we can get a vote on the rule anyhow. If a majority of the Senate do not desire to adopt it, well and good; but I shall not propose the amendment when the time comes to vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. In view of the statement just made by the Senator from Washington, that he has decided not to propose the amendment to which he called the attention of the Senate just before I rose, and to which I was addressing my remarks, I find no further justification for inflicting my observations on the Senate at this time further than to reply to one statement which the Senator from Washington made when he announced his purpose to present the amendment.

He expressed the hope that a vote on this amendment, or a measure along this line, might be had in the Senate at an early date. The subject of this amendment was submitted to the Committee on Rules some time ago. The rule proposed was then offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], but it was made applicable to all matters under consideration before the Senate, and was not limited to appropriation bills. The Senate Committee on Rules decided by a very large majority not to report that rule. Of course, the Senator from Washington is at liberty to take any course he chooses to secure a vote on the question at another time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to the committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that I know when the forces here have the machinery well oiled, and in this instance they certainly have it well oiled. So I shall not ask for the yeas and nays on this proposition. I know the Senate is not going to adopt my substitute, but is going to adopt the proposed change in the rule. There are enough votes; the scheme is well carried out; so I shall content myself with a division, not asking for a roll call.

On a division, the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. There are two more amendments I desire to offer. On page 2, I move to strike out lines 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, to the words "Provided, however."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, strike out lines 4 to 10, as follows:

> The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing amendments proposing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing amendments proposing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill, and if the point is sustained, the bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRISON. If that amendment should be adopted, it would leave the rule the same as it is now touching provisions in general appropriation bills which are not authorized by law. Under the present rule if a provision is put in a general appropriation bill which is subject to a point of order, and the point of order is made and sustained, that particular provision is eliminated from the bill. Under the part of this proposed rule which I desire to strike out it is provided that if a provision is incorporated in a general appropriation bill which is subject to a point of order and the point of order is made and sustained, the bill will be referred back to the committee.

I put Senators on their guard that there are few, if any, appropriation bills reported out of the Appropriations Committee some parts of which are not subject to points of order, and if this provision is adopted there will be confusion here; practically every appropriation bill will be sent back to the Committee on Appropriations.

I ask for a vote on my amendment.

On a division, Mr. HARRISON'S amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to offer an amendment to be inserted at the end of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed amendment of the committee the following proviso:

> Provided, That in cases where points of order are made against amendments offered by individual Senators to general appropriation bills it shall not be necessary for the Senator proposing the amendment, or for a Senator favoring it, to give "one day's notice" of an intention to move a suspension of any rule or part thereof in order to gain consideration for and a vote upon said amendment, nor shall it require a two-thirds vote to secure such suspension, anything in Rule XL or in the precedents of the Senate in construing such rule to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, under the rule as it is now framed, where a point of order is made against any provision not authorized by law, the bill will be referred back to the Committee on Appropriations, and consequently there will be no legislation on a general appropriation bill. Well and good. Many believe that there should not be. I believe in exceptional cases there might be and should be. But Senators now, under the proposed arrangement, must make their fight on general appropriation bills upon the floor of the Senate. Amendments must be offered to the bills by the individual Senators and the fight will be waged here. The great influence that has been exerted and wielded by the Appropriations Committee will be manifested against every amendment that is proposed upon the floor of the Senate by any Senator on any general appropriation bill. They can exercise their right or any Member can exercise his right by making the point of order. Then the individual Senator who is interested in his amendment must give his day's notice and get a two-thirds vote of the Senate to pass his amendment. My amendment merely proposes to change that rule as far as the day's notice and the two-thirds vote are concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, those are all the amendments I have to offer. The resolution is now upon its final passage and will be passed. I serve notice as an individual Senator that if there are any amendments or any provisions in any general appropriation bill from now on not authorized by law there will be a point of order made against them and the bill will go back to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe if the Senator does that and follows it faithfully he will perform a great service for the country.

Mr. HARRISON. And it will create a lot of confusion, too.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, notwithstanding the threat of the Senator from Mississippi, I shall venture to offer an amendment myself.

In the amendment offered to the original resolution the Committee on Rules, in enumerating the committees, overlooked the proper title of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. In the resolution amendment it was designated merely as the Committee on Agriculture. I move to insert the words "and Forestry" after each place in the bill where the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is erroneously named.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the reprint, on page 2, line 11, and on page 2, line 17, after the word "Agriculture," in each place insert the words "and Forestry."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, not because I expect to change the situation, which is arranged, but because I want to put on record a protest, I desire to take a few minutes of the Senate's time.

The proposed rule concentrates control of all appropriations in the hands of one committee. The committee, already very powerful, will be made almost omnipotent. The movement is in direct opposition to the general talk we constantly hear of democratizing the public business. It is a process of concentration which is well nigh revolutionary.

Every man experienced in legislative bodies knows that a power such as is here conferred can be employed in many ways to influence legislation not coming strictly within the purview of the committee's authority. The movement is well disguised and is brought here with the excuse that it is compelled by virtue of the action of the House of Representatives; but the originators of the plan of concentration saw fit to begin in the House of Representatives. They there secured the action they desired, which places the House of Representaties in a control which will be far more potential than was the control under the Cannon rule. Because that has been done in the House, the excuse is made that it must be done here; and members of the Democratic Party upon the Committee on Rules have accepted the situation with a pliability that must be very welcome to those who are back of this scheme of concentration.

Mr. OVERMAN. It complies with the Democratic platform.

Mr. REED. Oh, my friend says it complies with the Democratic platform. In the first place, the rule was not before the Democratic convention. There was a resolution there to the effect that appropriations should be placed in the hands of single committees in the House and Senate. That does not mean an indorsement of this rule; and if it did I wonder who would think it binding? What did the Democratic national convention know regarding legislative proceedings in the two bodies of Congress? All that this character of resolution in the platform means is that somebody was present who saw fit to slip the resolution through the committee, and when it went on the floor of the convention it was accepted as a matter of course.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Were there not a great many Members of Congress, from both the House and Senate, in the Democratic national convention?

Mr. REED. Yes; there were a great many Members of Congress, from both House and Senate, in that convention.

Mr. WARREN. They ought to know the method of procedure in Congress.

Mr. REED. Not a single one of them probably, except the man who introduced the resolution, paid any attention to it. They probably never heard it read from the desk.

There are certain principles which go into a political platform that represent the sentiments of the people, that are understood when they are brought forward, and every party man regards them as very persuasive, if not binding. But a thing like this had no more business in a party platform than a resolution in regard to the character of collar that should be put on every dog in the country. It has not anything to do with a political party's business and has nothing to do with political principles. It has to do with the technical work of the two bodies of Congress, and I do not propose to dignify it by discussing it.

This is a deliberate plan brought forward by the masters, or the leaders, I should say, of the majority party for the purpose of concentrating the power of Congress in the two committees. They put it through the House, and then the members of the Senate on the committee, to use a slang expression, "fell for it," and are aiding and abetting in the passage of the rule.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator overlooked the fact that President Wilson in the strongest terms appealed to Congress to do the very thing of putting appropriations in one committee of the House and one committee of the Senate?

Mr. REED. I do not want to say a single word reflecting upon the former President, and I will not, but Congress might just as well have gone down and told the President whom he should have for his doorkeeper and whom he should have for his clerks and how the clerks should do their work, as for the President to have come to Congress to tell us what kind of committees we should have. If that is the only reason, you have to advance for the rule you had better withdraw it even with all the majority you have here. Somebody else at some other time said it ought to be done, whether it was a Democratic national convention or whether it was a very fine man who was at one time President of the United States.

The rule gives to a few men in the Senate control to a very large extent, and it is intended back of that to give to one man known as the Director of the Budget, a control over the committees themselves, and to give to the man who appoints the Director of the Budget, to wit, the President, the power through the Director of the Budget and through the committees to control the acts of Congress with reference to what? With reference to revenue matters. For 500 years and more the English-speaking race have maintained their independence and enlarged their liberties by the exercise of one power, the power to control the revenues, by holding it within their own hands, away from the domination of any Executive whatsoever.

When one king at least undertook to override that power he went to the block, as he should have gone.

The concentration of legislative power in the hands of the Executive has been going on in this country until to-day there are a large number of people who believe that it is the duty of those who are members of the same political party to which the President happens to belong to obey the presidential will just as the Reichstag obeyed the mandate and will of the German Emperor. I voted against the bill creating the Budget Bureau, and every day I live and hear about the Budget Bureau the more certain I am that I was right. Let me tell Senators of an incident. The last river and harbor bill carried something like $13,000,000. The amount recommended by the Budget Bureau this year, I believe, is $12,500,000. Inquiry was made as to why the amount was made $12,500,000, and the head of the Budget Bureau admitted, so I am informed, that he had found that in one year we had appropriated $12,000,000; that in another year we had appropriated $13,000,000; and that he had split the difference and made it $12,500,000. He did not know that the reason we had appropriated only $13,000,000 last year was because there were $48,000,000 unexpended of former appropriations, and therefore we had cut the amount to $13,000,000, because that left a total of $61,000,000.

Under the Budget system we go outside of Congress and appoint one man, whose chief title to fame is that he came down and cursed a committee of Congress, who is supposed to tell a committee of Congress how much money they should appropriate. Then that committee of Congress, being all powerful under this resolution, will follow his mandate, or at least it is expected that they will follow his mandate.

This resolution ought to be entitled "a resolution to authorize the President of the United States to regulate the appropriations of Congress." That is exactly the way it will work out. I know Senators are going to vote for it; I know it is idle to stand here expecting to change any votes in the Senate; but I simply want to state the case, so that it may be in the RECORD, in order that the few people in the country who may hear of these debates may have the suggestion made to them.

The next observation I want to make is that inevitably by this action we are going to lessen the real guardianship of the public revenues. All this talk about the various committees not doing proper work in looking into revenue measures is, in my opinion, idle. I have served upon committees, as have all of us, that have had to do with appropriations for various departments, and I have never yet seen a committee fail to study a bill carefully and to bring to its consideration a knowledge relative to the particular department whose needs they were considering that could not be possessed by any committee that had not intimately and closely studied the particular question under consideration. The Agricultural Committee will know a very great deal about agricultural problems, and when it sits down to study the question of an appropriation it brings to that question the knowledge it possesses with reference to the subject of agriculture. When the business is transferred over to the general committee the knowledge is not at the same time transferred to that committee. What I have said of the Agricultural Committee is true as to the Naval Committee, the Committee on Military Affairs, and of all of the great committees.

A palliation of that manifest evil is undertaken to be offered by the scheme of having the chairman of these various committees and one or two members meet with the general Appropriations Committee, but when they meet with the general Appropriations Committee they only represent a minority of the committee. They can not lay before the committee the knowledge of the committee; they can only lay their individual views before the committee. Then when it comes to voting they have nothing to say about that, because they are so small a part of the membership of the committee that their votes do not count.

The bill having thus been formulated and having been reported by the dominant majority of the Appropriations Committee, it is brought here to this floor. Every Senator who has heard appropriation bills discussed knows that if they have not been properly thrashed out in committee they very seldom get real consideration upon the floor of the Senate. Accordingly, this great bill, embracing many items, will be thrust here upon the Senate, five or six or a dozen Senators will be willing to stay here and follow the items through, but no Senator will be familiar with the bill except a few who are on the general Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. REED. Just let me finish the sentence. The result will be that the Appropriations Committee will be omnipotent and will absolutely control the situation.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from Missouri knows that some of the members of the Appropriations Committee have served for a long time upon various other committees, so that in addition to the ex officio members of the particular committee a majority, I might say, in most cases, or, at any rate, a considerable number of Senators on the regular Appropriations Committee will have severally served on the other committees.

Mr. REED. There will be some Senators who will have served on other committees; but this is a concentration of the power of the Senate in one committee. All the quibbling and dodging and twisting and excuses that can be put forward will deceive no man who has any sense or who has had any experience. If the amendment to the rules is not going to make any change, why is it proposed? If it is not going to concentrate power, why is not the rule left just as it is? You all know what you are doing. I merely want you to know that I know what you are doing.

Mr. WARREN. I somewhat doubt it.

Mr. REED. The Senator may doubt it, but when I get so far into the dark that I can not see my way out I will get the Senator to carry an intellectual torch for me so that I may find my way out.

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. The next observation I desire to make—and it is the last one—is that when we try the new system out we are going to find such a congestion in this one committee that in all human probability we will find that, instead of facilitating the business of the Senate and of the country, we will have produced exactly the opposite result; but you are going to do it, and—

'Twere well
It were done quickly.

For one I want to record my protest, and having done so I am content.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	New	Smith
Ball	Hale	Newberry	Smoot
Borah	Harreld	Nicholson	Spencer
Brandegee	Harris	Norbeck	Stanfield
Broussard	Harrison	Norris	Stanley
Bursum	Heflin	Oddie	Sterling
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sutherland
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Page	Swanson
Capper	Kellogg	Pepper	Townsend
Caraway	Keyes	Phipps	Underwood
Colt	King	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Cummins	Ladd	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Lenroot	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	Lodge	Rawson	Warren
Fernald	McCormick	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	McCumber	Robinson	Watson, Ind.
France	McKellar	Sheppard	Weller
Frelinghuysen	McKinley	Shields	Williams
Gerry	McNary	Shortridge	Willis
Glass	Nelson	Simmons

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, is the question on the final passage of the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is one further amendment of the Committee on Rules, which will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Rules was, on page 2, line 2, to strike out the words "of the head of some one of the departments," and to insert "submitted in accordance with law," so as to read:

Resolved, That clause 1 of Rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate submitted in accordance with law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to know if the yeas and nays have been ordered previously on this question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have not been, and perhaps the Chair was in haste in concluding that a sufficient number of Senators had joined in the demand.

Mr. SMITH. I observed only one hand going up.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest that the roll call has started, and I make the point of order that the roll call is proceeding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks, without objection, that he ought to inquire whether the demand is supported. If there is no objection, those who join in the demand for the call of the yeas and nays will raise their hands. [A pause.] The supposition of the Chair was correct, and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, may the question be stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is it in the Senate or in Committee of the Whole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a Senate resolution and does not go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask to have the resolution, as amended, read from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution, as amended, will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That clause 1 of Rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate submitted in accordance with law.

"The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing amendments proposing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing amendments proposing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill, and if the point is sustained, the bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations: Provided, however, That three members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry shall be a member of the conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said agricultural appropriation bill; that three members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said Post Office appropriation bill; that three members of the Committee on Military Affairs, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Department of War is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Military Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of War; that three members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the Department of the Navy is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said bill making appropriations for the Department of the Navy; that three members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia is being considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and at least one member of the Committee on the District of Columbia shall be a member of the conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon said District of Columbia appropriation bill; that three members of the Committee on Commerce, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the items pertaining to rivers and harbors are being considered by the Committee on Appropriations in the bill making appropriations for the Department of War, and at least one member of the Committee on Commerce shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House upon items pertaining to rivers and harbors contained in the bill making appropriations for the Department of War; and that three members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to be selected by said committee, shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve on said committee when the items pertaining to the Diplomatic and Consular Service are being considered by the Committee on Appropriations in the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and at least one member of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be a member of any conference committee appointed to confer with the House when the items pertaining to the Diplomatic and Consular Service are being considered in the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming whether, under the first paragraph of this resolution, the Senate would be prevented, when a bill was before the Senate, from adopting an amendment increasing any item found in the bill?

Mr. WARREN. No more so than now. It can not be done now, as the rules stand, if a point of order is made. The only difference is that now, when attention is called to the fact, the amendment can be stricken out and the remainder of the bill can be considered at once. Under this new attachment to the old rule, a point of order can be made which, if sustained, will send the bill back to the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to mean that under the provision of the Budget law no increase may be made upon the floor of the Senate in any item carried in any appropriation bill?

Mr. WARREN. No; that is incorrect. If the Budget estimate is higher than the amount contained in the bill, the difference between the two amounts can be offered as an amendment by any Senator, and it will be in order. If the matter itself is in order, the amendment is in order.

Mr. KING. Suppose the Budget Committee had recommended an appropriation of $100,000 for a given purpose, and the Appropriations Committee had made it $150,000, and the Senate was convinced that it should be $160,000. As I understand this amendment to the rules, that amount can not be increased.

Mr. WARREN. That does not change the situation a single iota from what it is now. Of course the ability of the Senate or of the House to allow more money than the Budget calls for is acknowledged, although so far at this session I do not recall a single item, either on the House side or on this side, that has been increased above the limit that the Budget has proposed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my understanding has been that in the past there was no limitation upon the authority of either branch of Congress to increase any appropriation that was reported by any Appropriations Committee of the Senate or the House.

Mr. WARREN. It had to be, under the rules. There are several rules relating to this. First, if it is sought, as the Senator will see if he reads the old rule, to raise the amount over what the committee has recommended, it must be sustained by another point. It must not be legislation. It must be by an amendment offered the day before and sent to the Committee on Appropriations, or it must be something that has been reported regularly from some other committee or to carry out a law or a treaty that has already passed the Senate. Those rules are not changed in any way whatever.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator, an amendment may be offered for the purpose of increasing any item of appropriation in an appropriation bill, notwithstanding the rule which is now proposed, to the same extent as if this rule were not adopted?

Mr. WARREN. Precisely, except as to the one item of the late rule I mentioned; and instead of knocking one item out, leaving the bill before the Senate, the bill would have to go back before the committee if so demanded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is necessarily absent. I am informed that he would vote on this question as I shall vote, and I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when Mr. KENDRICK's name was called). The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. The junior Senator from Wyoming is detained from the Senate on official business. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent on account of a death in his family. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS].

The result was announced—yeas 63, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—63.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9103, an act for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes.

This is what is commonly known as the "judges'" bill. I think Senators are generally familiar with its main provisions, and I need say no more until after the motion I have made is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether he expects to prosecute the consideration of the bill to a conclusion this afternoon?

Mr. CUMMINS. That I can not predict. I do not know whether there is to be any opposition to the bill or not. If there is no opposition to it, I see no reason why it should not be disposed of this afternoon.

Mr. KING. I think there will be some opposition to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can easily understand that there will be some opposition.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I want to inform Senators, so that they may govern their actions accordingly, that there will be a great deal of opposition to the bill, and it will be impossible to dispose of it this afternoon.

Mr. CUMMINS. The fact that we may not be able to dispose of it this afternoon should not be a reason for not taking it up.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not object to taking it up.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have understood that the Senator from Tennessee has been willing for some time that it should be taken up.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. On Saturday, when the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] asked unanimous consent to fix the hour for voting upon the resolution just agreed to at 4 o'clock, I suggested that he couple with that my request to vote upon the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] to refer my resolution to investigate the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Senator from Wyoming prevailed on me to withdraw my request, and the Senator from New Jersey assured me that he thought there would be no objection on the other side to having a vote on my resolution following the vote we have just taken. I would like to have that vote taken if possible, and if the motion to send the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency is defeated, as I hope it will be, I shall move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator from Alabama that I recall the incident to which he has referred. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] gave notice long ago that he would bring up his judiciary matter in order to make it the unfinished business. I am hoping that he will be willing to lay it aside after he gets it up in order to allow the Committee on Appropriations to bring up the District of Columbia appropriation bill; but I am sure that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], who has charge of that bill, would be glad to yield to the wish of the Senator from Alabama for a vote, if it does not lead to long debate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no desire to delay the Senator from Colorado in the consideration of the bill in his charge, nor to delay the Senator from Iowa in his matter. I merely ask that a vote may be had.

Mr. CUMMINS. I gave notice, I think, quite two weeks ago that at the very first opportunity I would move that the Senate take up the bill to which I have referred. I have been as patient as I think Senators usually are, and have given way to matters which seemed to be of immediate, momentary importance. I do not feel that I can give way longer. What may be the proper thing to be done after the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of this bill is yet to be determined. I have never felt disposed to insist upon any general legislation of this character preventing the consideration and passage of appropriation bills, because they must be considered; but I feel that I must insist upon the motion I have made.

CONSIDERATION OF WASHINGTON CONFERENCE TREATIES.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no objection, of course, to the motion which the Senator from Iowa has made. I have no objection to his making the bill the unfinished business or to his allowing the District of Columbia appropriation bill to come up and giving way temporarily to that, if that is the desire; but I do not want any misunderstanding in regard to the treaties. I think the treaties are a matter of first importance for the Senate to dispose of. It is my intention to call up the four-power treaty to-morrow immediately after the assembling of the Senate, whether in recess or in adjournment. I shall keep them before the Senate in order to reach, as soon as possible, a vote upon them. They are of very first importance, and, though I do not mean to press them unduly and do not desire to inconvenience Senators, I must press them for discussion and to a vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recognize the right of the Senator from Massachusetts to move at any time that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the treaties to which he refers. I do not conclude myself by any promise with regard to the matter. All I am interested in now is that the Senate shall agree to the motion I have made to take up the judges' bill for consideration.

Mr. LODGE. May I say just one more word? I have not quite concluded. I ask Senators who desire to speak and intend to speak on the treaties to do so as soon as possible, and to be prepared. I do not want to put the treaties over any further on the ground that there is no one ready to speak. I should like Senators who intend to speak to prepare to do so. I want to have the fullest debate, and I ask Senators to be ready to speak, so as to enable me to press the treaties to a conclusion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. The four-power treaty was presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, as the leader upon the Republican side, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], as the leader upon the Democratic side. It is my hope to make some observations upon it, but it is my hope as well to have a clear explanation of the treaty by the two Members of the Senate, who are parties to it, before general debate ensues. May I ask, therefore, whether the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama are not going at least to indulge in some exposition of the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Alabama told me this morning that it is his intention to speak as soon as possible, and it is my own intention to speak as soon as possible. I shall not interfere with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to-morrow, but I shall speak at a very early date and give the best explanation I can.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sure of that, and that it will be a very excellent one, but some of us will desire to respond to it as well.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK AT ATLANTA.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. In reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], he is entirely correct in his statement that it seemed to have been a matter of mutual consent, without any unanimous-consent agreement being entered into, that following the vote on the resolution changing the rule, which has now been completed, a vote without further debate would be taken upon my motion that the resolution introduced by the Senator from Alabama be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I trust that that may be done, because it will not require any time of the Senate beyond a call of the roll. As I recall, it was the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama that the vote should be taken without further debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey, as a means to relieve the Senate from the controversy which has been pending so long, why not refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. EDGE. It seems to me that that suggestion is entirely out of order. The proponent of the measure himself has made the request that the pending motion be voted upon, and I acquiesced in that request so far as an individual Senator could do so. It seems to me that it would require very little time of the Senate to have a roll call to dispose of the motion, if the Senator from Iowa will permit that to be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. I had not understood that the proponent of the resolution was ready to have the motion voted upon without further debate. If that is the case, of course I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. EDGE. That was the suggestion of the proponent of the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggested that if the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency was defeated, then I would ask to have it referred to the Committee on Rules. I am ready to have a roll call. Let us have a vote.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. EDGE. If I may, I will ask the Senator from Iowa if he will permit us to have unanimous consent——

Mr. CUMMINS. I must object to that until my pending motion is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9103.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of the United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS. In view of the complications which seem to have arisen and in view of the desire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to proceed with an appropriation bill, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what is the unfinished business?

Mr. CUMMINS. The so-called judges bill.

Mr. NORRIS. When did that become the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just now.

Mr. NORRIS. Does that make it the unfinished business to-morrow?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. NORRIS. This is the first time any such thing as that ever happened.

Mr. LODGE. It was taken up in legislative session after 2 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. It depends on what happens in the meantime whether it is the unfinished business or not.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, on February 28, for the Committee on Appropriations I reported to the Senate the District of Columbia appropriation bill, making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923. I am going to ask that, the judges bill being temporarily laid aside, the District of Columbia appropriation bill may be taken up for consideration, but I have no objection whatever to consenting that a vote be taken immediately on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey with reference to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Alabama. As I understand, that vote is to be had without debate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK AT ATLANTA.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Secretary please state the pending question, so Senators may thoroughly understand it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the pending business is temporarily laid aside in order that a vote may be taken on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey. The Assistant Secretary will state the motion.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Senate resolution 242, by Mr. HEFLIN, providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate certain alleged political activities of officials of the Federal reserve bank in Atlanta, Ga., with a motion by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] pending that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who is absent on official business. He is paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

I also desire to announce the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], who is absent on account of illness and is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS].

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and vote "yea."

Mr. MCCORMICK. I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who is not present. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—37.

So Mr. HEFLIN's resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill may be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, that means that the bill will not be taken up and read from the beginning, paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. PHIPPS. If my request be granted, the bill must be read, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the bill should be read paragraph by paragraph, so that we may follow the reading. If the other procedure is followed, we can not follow the reading of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course the bill must be read in the way the Senator has suggested, but if it is read for amendment, of course amendments may be offered. The Senator, I presume, has no objection to that?

Mr. HARRISON. I should like the reading of the bill to start at the beginning and go to the end, so that we may the better keep up with it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me say to the Senator from Mississippi that, as I understand, if the request of the Senator from Colorado be granted the bill has to be read through entirely, and it will be read paragraph by paragraph, but an amendment may be offered at any place in the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that.

Mr. PHIPPS. My request was that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read first for committee amendments, other amendments to be in order after the committee amendments shall have been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HARRISON. It requires unanimous consent to change the rule that the bill shall first be read.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly it does.

Mr. HARRISON. And I have objected to the request. I desire that the bill shall be read, so that we may keep up with it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Mississippi that the bill, of course, must be read, but under the rule a formal reading is required. If that is insisted on, we must sit here during that time and do nothing except listen to the reading of the bill, as no amendment or interruption can be allowed; but by consenting to the request for unanimous consent, made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], to dispense with the formal reading of the bill, the bill will be read for amendment, the committee amendments will first be considered and acted on, and then other amendments will be in order. In that way the consideration of the bill will be expedited. I know that the Senator from Mississippi does not intend needlessly to delay the consideration of the bill, because he is anxious to have it passed.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not desire to delay the bill at all.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will lose no advantage nor will his privilege of making any point he may desire be interfered with by allowing the first formal reading of the bill to be dispensed with, as has been requested by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HARRISON. I object to the request of the Senator from Colorado, because I think it is the better practice to begin the reading of the bill at the beginning and to read it paragraph by paragraph. When the Secretary comes to a committee amendment, then we may vote on that amendment; and if it is desired to offer an amendment to the bill, that should be permitted to be done. So, I repeat, I think we should begin at the beginning and read the bill through.

Mr. LODGE. That is what will have to be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands there is objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. Then I ask that the Secretary proceed with the reading of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. During the formal reading of the bill there is nothing in order, is there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. During the formal reading of the bill nothing else is in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Mississippi by his objection insists upon the letter of the rule being observed.

Mr. LODGE. I did not understand that the Senator from Mississippi had insisted on the formal reading of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what the Senator is insisting on, in order that he may keep up with the matter.

Mr. LODGE. Then the bill has to be read in its entirety, without considering amendments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The objection is made in order to consume time.

Mr. HARRISON. I care nothing about the reading of the bill as a formality or the consideration of committee amendments, as well as any other amendments that may be offered when there is no committee amendment pending; but I think that we should begin with the first line of the bill and read it through.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I may say so, the Senator from Colorado asked that that very thing be done, and the Senator from Mississippi objected.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Colorado asked that the committee amendments be first considered. I objected to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Mississippi is mistaken. The Senator from Colorado asked that the bill be read for committee amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. That it be read for committee amendments?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I have objected to that.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has no objection to the bill being read for amendments, but he does not wish to give precedence to committee amendments?

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely, that is my position.

Mr. PHIPPS. I have no objection——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be read for amendment.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 1, after line 2, to strike out:

That 40 per cent of the following sums, respectively, is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, only, namely:

If the estimated net revenues of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, are not sufficient to meet the proportion of the appropriations for that fiscal year charged against such revenues by this and all other acts, or which may be estimated to be charged against such revenues by acts that may be approved during such fiscal year, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall increase the rates of taxation on real estate and tangible personal property sufficiently to make up the difference: Provided, however, That such rates of taxation shall in no event be less than 1½ per cent nor more than 2 per cent.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the general expenses of the District of Columbia shall be chargeable to and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

For the fiscal year 1923 and annually thereafter the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia shall be fair and reasonable, and the revenues derived from this source shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous revenue.

Until otherwise provided by law the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia on tangible personal property and real estate shall be $1.75 per hundred, and other taxes shall be as now provided.

The appropriation of an amount equal to the unexpended or unappropriated surpluses of the District revenue shown by the reports of the commissioners to have been heretofore accumulated and deposited in the Treasury of the United States in addition to the estimates submitted for the next fiscal year is hereby authorized, and hereafter there shall be no limit upon the amount of the estimates to be submitted to Congress to meet the annual needs of the District, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

In fixing the value of improvements on any lot or tract of real estate for the purpose of taxation the first $2,000 of value thereof shall be exempt, and shall not be taken into consideration in fixing such value.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the point of order against that amendment. I do not think there is any authority of law for changing the present law which governs this matter and to substitute what is proposed by the committee amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me, I should like to ask that this amendment may be passed over temporarily. I think I can find some rulings by Presiding Officers of the Senate covering the point which the Senator from Mississippi makes. At any rate, I should like to have it passed over temporarily, if the Senator has no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think that any Senator could contend that this is not new legislation, and if it is new legislation, in view of the adoption of the new rule which has just been imposed upon us, the bill should go back to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to submit some observations on the point the Senator has made.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no use in taking up the time of the Senate on this question, because the rule that has been adopted provides that if new matter is reported in a general appropriation bill and a point of order is made against it and sustained the bill shall go back to the committee. So I make the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will not take very much time in discussing the question, but I desire to look up the precedents. I will present my reasons in perfect good faith. I think the amendment is in order, and I desire to give my reasons for so thinking; but I wish to have an opportunity to look up the record and some decisions by former Presiding Officers bearing on this very question. I am sure the Senator would have no objection to passing the amendment over temporarily.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to help the other side expedite the public business——

Mr. LODGE. That is perfectly obvious——

Mr. HARRISON. And there is no use in discussing an item in the District of Columbia appropriation bill if, under the rule which has just been adopted, when a point of order is made against an amendment and sustained the item has got to go out and the bill go back to the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly; but I contend that that is not the correct position; that is all.

Mr. HARRISON. Why would it not be better to lay this bill aside until to-morrow and allow the Senator from Iowa to go on with his judiciary bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There are many provisions in this bill, some of which, probably, will create discussion.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but what is the use of discussing these provisions if, under the new rule just adopted, the bill must go back to the committee if a point of order is made and sustained that it contains new or general legislation?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield; take, for instance, page 100, on which there is obviously new legislation, to which a point of order will be made, which will send the bill back to the committee. Senators in the majority may just as well face the new rule, which they put through with an iron hand on their side and with blandishments to this side, which were successful. They have adopted the new rule, and now within 40 minutes they refuse to take the medicine which they have prepared. Mr. President, the question should be tested and fought out now. This bill is filled with new legislation. On page 100, for instance, several hundred thousand dollars are appropriated in an amendment embodying new legislation for which there is no authorization under existing law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor.

Mr. LODGE. With all deference, the statement of the Senator from Mississippi that the first amendment embodies new legislation and the statement of the Senator from Arizona that something else is new legislation do not make those items new legislation.

Mr. ASHURST. I understand that, but I am expressing my opinion.

Mr. LODGE. The question is open to decision by the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I understand that.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not contend that the first amendment is not new legislation, does he?

Mr. LODGE. I have not examined it at all; I never saw it until this moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to this proposition: Does the Senator from Mississippi think that the rule which has just been adopted is retroactive? In other words, does he think that it would apply to an appropriation bill which was reported to the Senate a week before the new rule was adopted?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it would be a violation of the very spirit of the rule if it should be held not to apply in this instance.

Mr. ROBINSON. The spirit of the rule is one thing, but the question as to whether the rule is retroactive is another. The Committee on Appropriations reported this bill under the rules of the Senate as they then existed. The question which I have raised is as to whether or not the rule is retroactive; that is to say, whether, in the case of a bill which was reported before the new rule was adopted, a point of order that an amendment embodied new or general legislation, if sustained, would send the bill back to the committee. I do not think it would.

Mr. LODGE. The item itself would go out of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. In other words, in order to get business done, it is necessary to work under the old rule, thereby demonstrating the folly of the new rule.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest the advisability of taking three days more to discuss the rule we have just adopted.

Mr. ASHURST. We would do a very great service to the country if we would go back to the old rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there is not the least cause for excitement about this matter.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Arkansas is excited.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that the rule is not retroactive and that it would not apply to a bill reported before the rule was adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Chair is going to rule just on the letter of the rule and not on the spirit of the rule, if what has been done to-day and all the arguments that have been made are to be held for naught, of course the Chair would not sustain a point of order to send the bill back to the committee. I am sure, however, that the Chair would not by a decision violate the very spirit that pervaded this Chamber to-day—namely, that new legislation should not be placed upon a general appropriation bill—and rule that it should continue to be considered by the Senate even after a point of order is made and sustained to matter that has no place in the bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Mississippi if there was anything for the Committee on Appropriations to do but to follow the line that the Senate itself had laid down in passing the Jones bill? Could they ignore the express declaration of this body that instead of some 50–50 or 60–40 proposition there should be a flat rate of assessment for purposes of taxation which the District should pay into the Federal Treasury as its contribution to the upkeep of the District?

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that if this new provision in the bill touching taxation in the District of Columbia follows the law, it, of course, is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. PHIPPS. I have stated that it follows the expression of the Senate. The House has not yet passed upon the Senate bill known as the Jones-Caraway bill.

Mr. HARRISON. That is not what the rule that we adopted said. It said that the item must be to carry out the provisions of some law. Of course, the Senator knows that the mere action of the Senate in passing a proposition, without the sanction of the House, does not make it a law.

Mr. PHIPPS. I said that this bill was reported to the Senate on February 28, before the new rule was adopted. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is there anything in the new rule that we have just adopted that says that it shall apply to legislation that comes after its adoption, but that it does not have anything to do with bills now pending?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not think so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then how do we except one class of bills from it and make it apply to another? When does it become operative?

Mr. HARRISON. It became operative immediately after its adoption.

Mr. CARAWAY. Evidently that is not going to be the ruling of the Chair. Then when does it become operative?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it becomes operative at the time it is passed.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, there is something in it that we can not see that says that it shall not affect bills that we do not want it to apply to, but that it shall affect those that we do want it to apply to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, to get this matter straight, and in order to carry out the spirit of the Senate as expressed by the adoption of the resolution to-day, I move that the District of Columbia appropriation bill be recommitted to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that the ruling of the Chair must be had first. A point of order has been made, and I think we are entitled to the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the rule which reads—

> The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill—

And so forth, can not apply to reports made before the adoption of the rule.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, Mr. President, to carry out the spirit of the ruling of the Chair and the spirit of the Senate as expressed in the adoption of the rule to-day, I move that this bill, carrying appropriations for the District of Columbia, be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that it has been decided by the Chair that the new rule does not apply to this bill; but that does not dispose of the point of order. Under the old rule, if this is new legislation, the point of order is good as to this particular item; so the Senator has a right to insist upon that point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes; that point of order can be made, but the result under the old rule would be simply to throw out that item, and not carry back the entire bill to the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. PHIPPS. I move that the motion of the Senator from Mississippi be laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations. The Senator from Colorado moves that the motion to recommit be laid on the table. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That question is not debatable.

Mr. REED. I understand that it is not debatable, but I wanted to ask the Senator a question, to wit, if he does not think that a proceeding of that kind is very likely to make some trouble in getting this bill through?

Mr. PHIPPS. I think not.

Mr. REED. Here is a motion made, on which we are entitled to a vote.

Mr. PHIPPS. I think we might as well have the vote this way instead of the other way.

Mr. REED. Very well. We shall be very glad to stay with you a while.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. REED and Mr. HARRISON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I am sure that if that Senator were present he would vote as I shall vote, and therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair with my colleague [Mr. ERNST] and its transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who did not vote. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. KING (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I am advised that that Senator has not voted, and in his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent on account of a death in his family.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Smith

So Mr. HARRISON's motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations was laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. My point of order is that it changes existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. The point of order made by the Senator from Mississippi is in reference to the first amendment on the first page of the bill, I understand, on the ground that that changes existing law?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the ground that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to call the attention of the Chair to a principle to which I think he will find no exception in any of the precedents. Generally speaking, that point of order would be good as to this language, but the amendment of the committee is in reference to the language of the House, which of itself, if it were original language here, would be subject to the same point of order. In other words, the language of the House text is subject to the same point of order to which the Senate committee amendment is subject.

I think the principle of parliamentary law is as old as the hills, that an amendment to a provision in a bill which would be of itself, if other things were taken away, subject to a point of order, is not subject to a point of order because it is new legislation or because it is a change of existing law. We can not make the point of order as to the House text, and the point of order could not be good as to the Senate committee text, which violates the very rule violated by the House text.

The Chair can see in a moment where we would be left if that were the rule. The House could send a bill here with ever so much legislation in it, and it would be a physical impossibility for us to amend it. The point of order made in the House when the House had this bill before it would have been good and would have been sustained, but the bill passed the House and comes here in the shape of a bill which has passed the House, and therefore we have a right to change it by any amendment which is germane to the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The principle stated by the Senator from Nebraska is undoubtedly correct. The Chair is not informed as to whether the part that is proposed to be stricken out is new legislation. As far as the Chair knows, it is not new legislation, but a statement of existing law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was about to state to the Chair the fact.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in a moment. I want to be fair with the Chair. Of course, if the last statement of the Chair were correct, then the point of order ought to be sustained, I will admit; but I think the Senator from Washington will be able to convince the Chair that that is not the fact. He has the floor, and is about to speak to that point.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska. I do not think a point of order can be made in the Senate on the ground that a matter changes existing law. That is ground for a point of order in the House, but the point of order in the Senate must be based on the ground that the language is general legislation on an appropriation bill, as I understand it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true. My point was that the language was general legislation, but that it was an attempt to change what had passed the House, which was itself general legislation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether it changes it or not, if it is general legislation it is subject to a point of order in the Senate, not because it changes the law, but because it is legislation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the general law with reference to the District of Columbia now provides that the expenses of the District shall be divided equally between the Federal Treasury and the people of the District; in other words, that 50 per cent of the expenses of the District shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States and 50 per cent from the revenues of the District. That is one provision of the law. I am talking about general legislation now, not about the provisions in past appropriation bills The general legislation, passed in 1878, is that the expenses of the District shall be borne equally from the United States Treasury and from taxes raised in the District.

Then there is another law with reference to the rate of taxation in the District to the effect that the rate of taxation on tangible personal property and real estate in the District of Columbia shall be 1.50 per cent. The House has changed both those provisions in this bill. The House provides that instead of these appropriations being made on the 50–50 basis, they shall be made on the basis of 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District, and 40 per cent out of the Treasury, and the House has provided that the rate of taxation may be changed from 1.50 to not exceeding 2 per cent.

It is true that this applies only for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923; but the House has opened the door. It has changed the law for that time. I have not had time to look up the rulings of Vice President Marshall, but I remember very distinctly that he held that when the field was opened, it was as wide as it could be for legislation, and that when the House opened the door for legislation, no matter how slightly, the whole field of legislation is open to the Senate; in other words, that the Senate is within its rule, even when it is amending the provision of the House, because, as the Senator from Nebraska says, if the House can put provisions in a bill in the nature of legislation, no matter how restricted they may be, and the Senate can not amend such legislation, of course the Senate is helpless in that respect.

The point I make is that the House has opened the door, however slightly, for legislation; that it has changed the law which applies to the District of Columbia, not only in the matter of determining the ratio which shall be borne by the District and borne by the Federal Treasury, but that it has also changed the rate of taxation, and has permitted the law to be changed by the commissioners from 1.50 up to as high as 2 per cent. When it has opened the door in that way——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the point the Senator is making. Has the Senator in mind the act of the Sixty-sixth Congress, which appears to the Chair to contain the exact language which has been stricken out by the Senate committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Chair refers to the appropriation act of the Sixty-sixth Congress?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly; that is not legislation at all. There the House again violated the rule, and the Senate changed that for the year. That was only an appropriation bill. That might go on for 40 years, and yet it would not become permanent at all. I am citing the Chair to the permanent legislation of 1878; that is, the permanent legislation which makes this legislation of the House out of order.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. If both the House provision and the Senate committee amendment were stricken out, the permanent legislation would at once apply for the next fiscal year?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; on the basis provided in the law of 1878, and by the tax law; in other words, the organic law. I do not want the Vice President to become confused by the fact that for two or three years past we have been providing in appropriation bills for a different ratio than 50–50. That is true. The House and the Senate have had quite a controversy in conference, and some of the District of Columbia appropriation bills have been held up until almost the last day of the session, then the yielding has been had simply in order to get the legislation; but those provisions apply only to the one year, that is all. They do not change the permanent law, except for that year.

The Senate committee has seen fit to take advantage of the situation which is presented by the House language in this bill. We have attempted to put in a provision which, if adopted, will change the annual controversy which has been going on between the House and the Senate. We think we are clearly within our rights, that we are clearly within the rules of the Senate, and clearly within the precedents made by the rulings of the Vice President heretofore, that the House having opened the door, the Senate can enter the field of legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator says the act of last year was to apply only to one year?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And at the end of the year, or whenever its terms were carried out, it goes out of existence and the old law of 1878 comes into existence?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the part proposed to be stricken out is the attempt of the House to begin an amendment of the act of 1878?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It changes the act of 1878 so far as the coming fiscal year is concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the House having begun it, the rule is that it is not to be construed as a proposal of new legislation when the Senate starts to amend the new legislation which the House has placed in the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. My point of order is raised not to the House provision but to the Senate committee amendment to the House provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that; the question then arises, when a bill comes over to the Senate from the House in which there is a proposal to amend existing law and enact new legislation, whether the Senate has a right to amend it by inserting new legislation.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, this point of order is made under Rule XVI, and particularly, I assume, under paragraph 3 of that rule, and no amount of arguing, no sophistry can change the plain language of that rule. There are no exceptions mentioned in it. It reads:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

Human language could not be plainer. There are no reservations, absolutely no qualifications of any kind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator doubt the principle laid down by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]?

Mr. ASHURST. I do indeed, Mr. President. If the House sees fit, under its rules, to change existing law it may do so, but upon that domain the Senate is not permitted to enter unless by a two-thirds vote or by unanimous consent.

One of the wisest rules we have set up to guard the Treasury, one that by unanimous consent Senators seem to agree should be the rule, is that new legislation shall not be placed upon a general appropriation bill. To say that because the House entered that domain, therefore the House has stricken down the Senate rule, would mean that the House is making our rules. If, because the House enters the domain, this point of order is of no value, we are without a rule, and the House is making our own rule.

Mr. President, it may be that in justice and in morals when the House enters a domain the Senate should be permitted also to go into the matter and enter into new legislation; but that is not the rule. The rule is written specifically the other way. I call attention to the first two lines, and two lines only, of paragraph 3 of Rule XVI.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then, the Senator must hold that if the House undertakes to propose new legislation contrary to its rule, the Senate can not change it, but must accept it?

Mr. ASHURST. Not at all. It is within the power of the majority of the Senate to change it. It is within the power of the Senate by a separate bill to change it. It is within the power of the House to disagree to it. It is within the power of the Senate to disagree to the House provision. But the right of the Senate to protect itself against new or general legislation upon an appropriation bill can not be swept aside by the action of the House. If the Vice President holds that the point of order is good, then the Vice President is inevitably bound to hold, in effect, that the House sweeps away a part of our rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Senator would hold that the Senate can agree to a part of it, but can not disagree to a part of it?

Mr. ASHURST. It can disagree to a part of it, but it can not propose new or general legislation which is obnoxious to a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator is right, then does it not follow in the case now before the Senate that it would be an impossibility for the Senate to amend the House text?

Mr. ASHURST. Why, no.

Mr. NORRIS. How could we do it?

Mr. ASHURST. In the first place, the Senator claims that the House text is general legislation, does he not?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course I do. That is the reason why I agree to the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Then let us require the other House to live up to that salutary rule of not putting general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. How can we do it without an amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. Live up to the existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. How are we going to live up to the law when the House text is in violation of it and we are prohibited from offering an amendment to it?

Mr. ASHURST. Then the Senator will admit, will he, or will he not, that we are driven to violate or set aside a Senate rule in order to deal with the House text?

Mr. NORRIS. No. My contention is that the rule does not apply.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator will admit that if this language stood alone and we had no House text, it would be subject to a point of order?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator admits that, and the House therefore swept away the Senate rule, his very admission puts him out of court.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the House text repeals the law. We can offer an amendment to it or we can not. If we offer an amendment to it, then, if the Senator's position is correct, it is subject to a point of order under the Senate rule, and therefore we are prohibited from amending it.

Mr. ASHURST. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would tell me how it can be amended.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, for 500 years in the English-speaking world the policy of passing general legislation on a general appropriation bill has been condemned as a vicious policy. For 100 years in this Government nothing was considered more pregnant with vice than to attach general legislation to an appropriation bill. So unanimous was the idea in the Senate and in the Congress that this wise rule, which prevents general legislation on an appropriation bill, was set up. The way to reach the evil is to refuse to agree to the House text, remand them to the old parliamentary law, and send the bill back in that way.

Mr. NORRIS. But how are we going to refuse to agree to the House text without an amendment? Tell me that.

Mr. ASHURST. We are substituting new and altogether different legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but the Senator is going to take some other method. If we did not agree to the House text we would be obliged to have a Senate amendment striking it out or modifying it in some manner. How can we disagree without an amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. The House has rules against general legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. NORRIS. But the House did not enforce those rules in this case.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the Senate has a rule. If the argument of the Senator from Nebraska is right, of course, whenever the House violates its rule, then, perforce, the Senate must violate its rule. We have no such exception in our rules. The Senator asks what we shall do in a case like that. We shall have to vote it down or change our rules.

Mr. NORRIS. How can we vote it down without an amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. There can not be any doubt about our rule. Because the House violates its rule is certainly no reason why the Senate should violate its rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Still the fact remains that the Senate will have to accept the House text in an appropriation bill wherever it legislates, if the Senator's contention is correct——

Mr. ASHURST. Or reject it.

Mr. NORRIS. How can we reject it? Could we reject the whole bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Amend it by striking it out.

Mr. NORRIS. But that is an amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. No; an amendment is general legislation, and the pungent brain of the Senator from Nebraska is not going to pretend that to strike out language is general legislation. He is not going to contend that, because he would not make a specious argument. He really does not believe that. The rule does not say we shall not amend the bill. It says general legislation shall not be added.

Mr. NORRIS. And the proposition is that there is only one motion to amend which we can make, and that is to strike out the language of the House text?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the only thing we have ever done under our rules.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the only thing that can be done?

Mr. ASHURST. It is the only thing that ought to be done or need to be done under the circumstances.

Mr. McKELLAR. It ought to be done if we are going to live up to our rules.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, may I suggest that it seems to me this is a very simple proposition. Our rules prohibit an amendment in the Senate proposing general legislation on an appropriation bill, but if the House chooses to send us general legislation on an appropriation bill it is the duty of the Senate to consider it. When an amendment is proposed it is not a proposal of the committee proposing new or general legislation, because the original proposal has come from the House. The proposal is in the bill and that is not subject to a point of order. All the committee does in this amendment is not to propose general legislation but to modify the legislation which has been proposed by the House.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senate to-day adopted a resolution changing the rule, and some Senators voted for that change in the rules, notably the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], because of that part of the rule which provided that new matter could not be included on a general appropriation bill, and, if it should be, a point of order being sustained against it, it would send the bill back to the committee, thus making the new rule stronger than the present rule. But the rule which was adopted to-day did not say that simply because there is a provision in a general appropriation bill, which is there without authority of law, that in itself shall send the bill back to the committee. The point of order must be made to it, and it must be sustained by the Chair before the bill goes back to the committee.

Here is a provision which was incorporated in the bill by the House, called the 60–40 plan. That is not now the existing law. The existing law is the 50–50 plan. The bill comes to the Senate. The Senate committee places an amendment on it. The first question is on the Senate amendment. I have made a point of order against the Senate amendment. All must concede that this is a change in existing law. It is on a general appropriation bill. If the Senate committee amendment had not been included in the bill, the provision which was adopted by the House would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; it would not.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says it would not be subject to a point of order?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly it would not. The House provision, under either the old rule or the new rule, would not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. After the adoption of the rule to-day?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course not.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not understand it in that way.

Mr. LENROOT. The rule is very clear. The rule prohibits amendments proposing new or general legislation from being reported upon an appropriation bill, but it has nothing to do with the language in the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. I think we can find a common denominator on which we can all agree. Under the new rule it would clearly be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. The House provision?

Mr. ASHURST. No; the Senate committee provision.

Mr. LENROOT. The rule would be the same in either case. As the Senator knows, the point of order must first be made and a ruling made whether the point of order would apply or not.

Mr. ASHURST. Under the present rule the Senate committee text standing alone would be subject to a point of order, would it not?

Mr. LENROOT. I agree.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is frank and always intellectually honest. So we agree about that—the Senate committee text standing alone would be subject to a point of order. Although the text standing alone, if the Senate committee brought it in, would be subject to a point of order, yet because it relates to a matter upon which the House entered, but is general legislation nevertheless, and we are attempting to change that general legislation, the Senator says it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator see the distinction?

Mr. ASHURST. Frankly, I do not.

Mr. LENROOT. In the one case the new legislation is proposed by the House and is sent over here by the House, but in the other case the legislation is proposed by the Senate committee, which is prohibited.

Mr. ASHURST. That would be a good argument, and I admit the force of the argument, but we must take these rules as they are written. We can not go out in the byways and highways to find exceptions. All there is in the rule is contemplated within the first line of paragraph 3, which reads:

No amendment which proposes—

It is not an affirmative proposition; it begins by negativing all other propositions.

No amendment—

It is a negative proposition. Now, it is a rule under which we have operated a long time, and if it were intended not to apply to the House text it would have stated so. We can not go out in the unreturned parabola of distant fields and find some reservation to this rule. It plainly says "no amendment." It does not say "no amendment, except to the House text."

There is no need to talk about it any further, but it seems that we find a rule that will not work and then we vote for rules in the Senate under which we are supposed to work, and the very first thing we find some hesitancy on the part of able Senators about allowing individual Senators to make points of order upon matters never debated or doubted before.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not put my hand upon the decisions now, because they are not yet reported in the Precedents, but does not the Senator remember that this very question came up and Vice President Marshall ruled that an amendment standing by itself would be held to be general legislation and not in order, but the door being opened by a proposal that is not subject to a point of order the amendment itself is in order because the amendment does not in that case propose general legislation?

Mr. ASHURST. I am not going to dodge or evade that question. I believe that a careful search of the Precedents, though I am unable to lay my hand on it, will disclose that such a rule has been announced from the Chair, but my learned friend knows that there are at least 80 or 90 the other way. Certainly he is not going to pin his faith on that one lone decision.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to say that I have searched the precedents very diligently and I have been able to find only this one.

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure there are 100 which prevent and preclude general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes; but not on an amendment going to general legislation which has been put in the bill by the House.

Mr. ASHURST. I presume that there is a case where some temporary Presiding Officer, though some say the Vice President, might have held thus, but the common law of the Senate, the common opinion of every Senator here is and always has been, since I have been here, that general legislation would not be permitted on an appropriation bill. Suppose the House makes an appropriation for a particular purpose unknown to the law of the land and then the Senate says, "Ah, but the House entered that domain. There is no existing law for it, but the House appropriated $30,000, and we will appropriate $60,000 because the House entered that domain." Can not Senators see that they would be striking down one of our most salutary rules? The rules provide that the amount of an appropriation may not be increased by way of amendment, except under certain conditions, and an amendment providing such an increase would be obnoxious to a point of order, if raised. Are Senators going to argue that because the House entered that domain we will—if the Senators will pardon the expression—"go them one better" and will appropriate even more, notwithstanding the plain language of the rule that the amount of an appropriation can not be increased?

"But," it is said, "the House entered that domain. Can the House enter a domain and we not be permitted to enter it?"
